The PREFACE.

HOw unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my ſelf, to undertake a Work of this mixture; mine own reaſon, though exceeding weak, hath ſufficiently reſolved me. For had it been begotten then, with my firſt dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it ſelf to my younger years; and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkneſs of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly, purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my Diſcourſe, with this our renowned Iſland of Great Britain. I confeſs that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are run out in other travels, to have ſet together (as I could) the unjointed and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh affairs, than of the Univerſal: in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempeſtuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But thoſe inmoſt and ſoul-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured, with the deſire to ſatisfie thoſe few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adverſity; the former enforcing, the latter perſwading; have cauſed me to make my thoughts legible, and my ſelf the ſubject of every Opinion, wiſe or weak.

To the World I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (Fortune changing) ſped much better in any Age. For Proſperity and Adverſity have evermore tyed and untyed vulgar affections. And as we ſee it in Experience, That Dogs do alwayes bark at thoſe they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo it is with the inconſiderate multitude; who, wanting that Vertue which we call Honeſty in all men, and that eſpecial gift of GOD, which we call Charity in Chriſtian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given: led thereunto by uncertain Report only; which His Majeſty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (ſaith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter: underſtand firſt, and then reform righteouſly. Rumor, res ſine Teſte, ſine Judice, maligna, fallax; Rumour is without witneſs, without Judge, malicious, and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave S. Auguſtine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praiſe of good men, and deteſted that of the evil. And herein no man hath given a better Rule, than this of Seneca; Conſcientiæ ſatisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, ſequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis; Let us ſatisfie our own Conſciences, and not trouble our ſelves with fame; be it never ſo ill, it is to be deſpiſed, ſo we deſerve well.

For my ſelf, if I have in any thing ſerved my Countrey, and priſed it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sun-ſhine day to a Sea man after Shipwrack; and the contrary no other harm, than an outragious tempeſt after the Port attained. I know that I loſt the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her whom I muſt ſtill honour in the duſt; though further than the defence of Her excellent Perſon, I never perſecuted any man. Of thoſe that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the World, hath taken the accompt: ſo as for this kind of ſuffering, I muſt ſay with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themſelves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them; I can neither envy at ſuch their purchaſed glory, nor much lament mine own miſhap in that kind; but content my ſelf to ſay with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other ſatisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope, ſeeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Paſs-port. For were it otherwiſe; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then ſome poſſibility to perſwade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying, and extensive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath cast upon slime and dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear; and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several Picture of face, and every one a divers Picture of mind; every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of Opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations: so many natural and unnatural; wise, fooliſh, manly, and childish affections and passions in mortal men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of Plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himself; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life, did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the Worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam redeunt, quibus veritas non subest: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour; the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himself, but that his heart may be sometimes seen at his tongues end.

In this great discord, and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus Judex est vulgus: The common People are evil Judges of honest things, and whose Wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if to the better sort; every understanding hath a peculiar judgement, by which it both censureth other men, and valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I find these my worthless Papers torn with Rats; seeing the slothful Censurers of all Ages have not spared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition: the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of these natures, which lye in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, seeing Solomon complained long since; and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the Professors to their easie ways of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Eccles. cap. 12. Nihil facilius quàm reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approved custome of those, who have left the memories of Time-past to after-Ages; to give, as near as I can, the same right to History which they have done. Yet, seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, that it hath given us life in our understanding, since the World it self had life and beginning, even to this day; yea, it hath triumphed over time, which, besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of years, and given so fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, The wise work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it (I say) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed; how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled; how Kings and Kingdoms have flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkness of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our own like errours and ill-deservings. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terrour of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified minds, as to make us remember, That the Infinite Eye and Wisdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the Justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our own consciences; which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the Opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen Wisdom confess, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God: If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedness, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GOD'S Judgements in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies, would require a Volume apart: for the Sea of Examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the Earth; and their fortunes written only in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeeded, and have not seen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. GODS Judgements upon the greater and greateſt have been left to Poſterity; firſt, by thoſe happy hands which the Holy Ghoſt hath guided; and ſecondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of Men mighty and remarkable in the World. Now, to point far off, and to ſpeak of the converſion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greateſt and moſt glorious Kings, who have gnawn the graſs of the earth with Beaſts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or, of that wiſe working of Pharaoh, when he ſlew the Infants of Iſrael, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or, of the policy of Jezabel, in covering the murther of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law, with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſs proof, that far-off Examples would not be left to the ſame far-off Reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerved, what labour, practice, peril, blood-ſhed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the World have undergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed; to make themſelves and their Iſſues Maſters of the World? And yet hath Babylon, Perſia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the reſt, no fruit, no flower, graſs, nor leaf, ſpringing upon the face of the earth, of thoſe ſeeds: No, their very roots and ruines do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum everteruntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either overturned by the hand of man, or at length, by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of whoſe ruines, are diverſly given by thoſe that ground their Opinions on ſecond cauſes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (ſay the Politicians) by outward and foreign force, or by inward negligence and diſſention, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerve, That the greateſt have ſunk down under their own weight; of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret ſua: Others, That the divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath ſet down the date and period of every Eſtate, before their firſt foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my ſelf a day over to reſolve.

For ſeeing the firſt Books of the following Story, have undertaken the Diſcourſe of the firſt Kings and Kingdoms: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a Preface to travel after, and overtake far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the preſent, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes; who having beheld, both in divine and humane letters, the ſucceſs of infidelity, injuſtice, and cruelty; have (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame pattern.

True it is, that the judgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more ſtrange) the affection of any one man ſtirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched moſt with that which moſt nearly ſeemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwiſe beſt ſuiteth with his apprehenſion. But the judgements of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long proceſs of time, and won to give his bleſſing in one Age, to that which he hath curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to diſcern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among thoſe examples that are found in Ages removed far from the preſent, as in thoſe of later times. And that it may no leſs appear by evident proof, than by aſſeveration, That ill doing hath alwayes been attended with ill ſucceſs; I will here, by way of Preface, run over ſome examples, which the Work enſuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no ſooner paſſed over the violence of the Norman Conqueſt, than we encounter with a ſingular and moſt remarkable example of Gods Juſtice, upon the children of Henry the Firſt. For that King, when by force, craft, and cruelty, he had diſpoſſeſt, over-reach'd, and laſtly made blind, and deſtroyed his elder Brother, Robert, Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of the Land; GOD caſt them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Neeces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above an hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the Kings dearly beloved.

To paſs over the reſt, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the murther of that King, the iſſue of blood then made, though it had ſome times of ſtay and ſtopping, did again break out, and that ſo often, and in ſuch abundance, as all our Princes of the Maſculine Race (very few excepted) died of the ſame diſeaſe. And although the young years of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than ſuſpicious; yet, in that he afterwards cauſed his own Uncle, the Earl of Kent, to die, for no other offence, than the deſire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earl as then ſuppoſed to be living; the King making that to be Treaſon in his Uncle, which was indeed Treaſon in himſelf, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this, I ſay, made it manifeſt, that he was not ignorant of what had paſt, nor greatly deſirous to have had it otherwiſe; though he cauſed Mortimer to die for the ſame.

This cruelty, the ſecret and unſearchable Judgement of GOD, revenged on the Grandchild of Edward the Third; and ſo it fell out, even to the laſt of that Line, that in the ſecond or third deſcent, they were all buried under the ruines of thoſe buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the Second, who ſaw both his Treaſurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counſellors, ſome of them ſlaughtered by the people, others in his abſence executed by his enemies; yet he alwayes took himſelf for over-wiſe, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themſelves as great Politicians in thoſe days, as others have done in theſe; hoping to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelves by the murther of Glouceſter; died ſoon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more ſhameſully than did that Duke. And as for the King himſelf (who, in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatneſs, cannot be excuſed, as the diſavowing himſelf by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) He was in the prime of his youth depoſed, and murthered by his Couſin-German and Vaſſal, Henry of Lancaſter, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whoſe Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown trayterous; who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, proteſting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himſelf, and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he ſwore, that the depoſed King ſhould live. After he had enjoyed this Realm ſome few years, and in that time had been ſet upon on all ſides by his Subjects, and never free from Conſpiracies and Rebellions: he ſaw (if Souls immortal ſee and diſcern any things after the Bodies Death) his Grand-child Henry the Sixth, and his Son the Prince, ſuddenly, and without mercy, murthered; the poſſeſſion of the Crown (for which he had cauſed ſo much blood to be poured out) transferred from his Race, and by the Iſſues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd; enemies, whom, by his own practice, he ſuppoſed that he had left no leſs powerleſs, than the ſucceſſion of the Kingdom queſtionleſs, by entailing the ſame upon his own Iſſues by Parliament. And, out of doubt, humane reaſon could have judged no otherwiſe, but that theſe cautious proviſions of the Father, ſeconded by the valour and ſignal victories of his Son Henry the Fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the deſpair of all re-conqueſt and recovery. I ſay, that humane reaſon might ſo have judged, were not this paſſage of Caſaubon alſo true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus ſufficit, quæ Adamantinis credebantur radicibus eſſe fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things that ſeem to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now, for Henry the Sixth, upon whom the greateſt ſtorm of his Grand-father's grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard, the Grand-child of Edward; although he was generally eſteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet, as he refuſed the Daughter of Armaignac, of the Houſe of Navarre, the greateſt of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou (by which he loſt all that he had in France) ſo in condeſcending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Glouceſter, the main and ſtrong Pillar of the Houſe of Lancaſter; He drew on himſelf and his Kingdom the greateſt joint-loſs and diſhonour, that ever it ſuſtained ſince the Norman Conqueſt. Of whom it may truly be ſaid, which a Counſellor of his own ſpake of Henry the Third of France, Qu'il eſtoit une fort gentile Prince; mais ſon reigne eſt advenu en une fort mauvois temps: That he was a very gentle Prince; but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Seaſon.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practicers and contrivers of the Duke's death: Buckingham and Suffolk, becauſe the Duke gave inſtructions to their authority, which otherwiſe under the Queen had been abſolute; the Queen, in reſpect of her perſonal wound, ſpretæque injuria formæ, becauſe Glouceſter diſſwaded her marriage. But the fruit was anſwerable to the ſeed; the ſucceſs to the counſel. For after the cutting down of Glouceſter, York grew up ſo faſt, as he dared to diſpute his Right, both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their adherents, were diſſolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike down York; yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain path which his Father had troden out, deſpoiled Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdom. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That ſhe lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers; that ſhe lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her only Son the Prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the Crown was ſet on his head that did it? She lived to ſee her ſelf deſpoiled of her eſtate, and of her moveables: and laſtly, her Father, by rendring up the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000 crowns for her Ranſome, to become a ſtark Beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which Siracides calleth ſine, but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yielded ſince the World was. Sirac. 19.

And now it came to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaſter were rooted up, one only Earl of Richmond excepted; whom alſo he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelf ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter which Glouceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own preſence; of which tragical Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the Judgement of GOD in the ſame kind. And he, which (beſides the execution of his Brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himſelf had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Glouceſter to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predeceſſor; taught him alſo, by the ſame art, to kill his own Sons and Succeſſors, Edward and Richard. For, thoſe Kings which have ſold the blood of others at a low rate; have but made the Market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the Fourth, ſucceeded Richard the Third, the greateſt Maſter in miſchief of all that fore-went him; who, although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own Perſon, than all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly upon the affections of Haſtings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her Kindred, as he eaſily allured them to condeſcend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſevered from him: Secondly, he wrought their conſent to have them impriſoned: And laſtly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads ſevered from their Bodies. And having now brought thoſe his chief inſtruments to exerciſe that common Precept which the Devil hath written upon every Poſt, namely, To depreſs thoſe whom they had grieved, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſſed; He urged that Argument ſo far, and ſo forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himſelf, and of his Brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For he cauſed it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That, whenſoever the King, or his Brother, ſhould have able years to exerciſe their power, they would take a moſt ſevere revenge of that cureleſs wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey. Scelera ſceleribus tuenda. Sen. de Clem.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters Sons was without ſuſpect; and yet the Devil, who never diſſwades by impoſſibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But, when he found by Catesby, who ſounded him, that he was not fordable, he firſt reſolved to kill him ſitting in Council; wherein having failed with his Sword, he ſet the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And, becauſe nothing elſe could move his appetite, he cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgement of God, than this upon Haſtings, I have never obſerved in any Story. For, the ſelf-ſame day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Haſtings advice, executed at Pomfret; I ſay, Haſtings himſelf, in the ſame day, and (as I take it) in the ſame hour, in the ſame lawleſs manner, had his Head ſtruck off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent Oration perſwaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldom of Hereford for reward, beſides the hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings only Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his truſtieſt ſervant; he had his Head ſevered from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what ſucceſs had Richard himſelf after all theſe miſchiefs and murthers, policies, and counter-policies to Chriſtian Religion; and after ſuch time as with a mercileſs hand he had preſſed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords, other than the proſperity of ſo ſhort a life, as it took end, ere himſelf could well look over and diſcern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood obtained at GOD'S hand the effuſion of his; who became a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate inſtrument of Gods Juſtice. A politick Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wiſdom, beat down and overturned as many ſtrong oppoſitions, both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did; I ſay, by his wiſdom, becauſe, as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, ſo he alwayes weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazzard than ſo much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well obſerved the proceedings of Loys the Eleventh, whom he followed in all was royal, or royal-like; but he was far more juſt, and begun not their proceſſes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his ſervants, and therein exceeding wiſe; for whatſoever himſelf gave, he himſelf received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well, that the affections of men (purchaſed by nothing ſo readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatſoever he grieved his Subjects, he wiſely put it off on thoſe that he found fit miniſters for ſuch actions. Howſoever, the taking off of Stanlies Head, who ſet the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George Duke of Clarence, ſhews, as the ſucceſs alſo did, that he held ſomewhat of the errours of his Anceſtors; for his poſſeſſion in the firſt Line ended in his Grand-child, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now, for King Henry the Eighth, if all the Pictures and Patterns of a mercileſs Prince were loſt in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For, how many ſervants did he advance in haſte (but for what vertue no man could ſuſpect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others, of more deſert, gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather Honey, and in the end of Harveſt burnt them in the Hive? How many Wives did he cut off, and caſt off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof ſome of them for age, could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to give his accompt to GOD for the abundance of blood already ſpilt, he impriſoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earl of Surry the ſon; the one, whoſe deſerving he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings ſervice; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his leaſt diſpleaſure; the one exceeding valiant and adviſed; the other no leſs valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But beſides the ſorrows, which he heaped upon the Fatherleſs and Widows, at home; and beſides the vain enterpriſes abroad, wherein it is thought that he conſumed more treaſure, than all our victorious Kings did in their ſeveral Conqueſts; what cauſleſs and cruel wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the Fifth? What Laws and Wills did he deviſe to eſtabliſh this Kingdom in his own iſſues? uſing his ſharpeſt weapons to cut off, and cut down thoſe Branches, which ſprang from the ſame root that himſelf did. And in the end (notwithſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious proviſions) it pleaſed God to take away all his own, without increaſe; though, for themſelves in their ſeveral kinds, all Princes of eminent vertue. For theſe words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other women childleſs, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among other women. And that blood which the ſame King Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffuſed by the Sun-ſhine of his grace; from whence his Majeſty now living, and long to live, is deſcended. Of whom I may ſay it truly, That if all the malice of the World were inſuſed into one eye; yet could it not diſcern in his life, even to this day, any one of thoſe foul ſpots, by which the conſciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the Sword of his Juſtice, with which the moſt that fore-went him have ſtained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed; that he hath received it even from the Hand of God, and hath ſtaied the time of putting it on, howſoever he were provoked to haſten it: That he never took revenge of any man that ſought to put him beſide it; That he refuſed the aſſiſtance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princeſs did: That His Majeſty entred not by breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary Gate, which his own right ſet open; and into which, by a general love and obedience He was received. And howſoever His Majeſty's preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witneſs the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559.) yet he never pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of her long Reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulneſs to God for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britanny to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were ſevered, but by ſmall brooks and banks, yet, by reaſon of the long continued War, and the cruelties exerciſed upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely ſevered. This, I ſay, it is not the leaſt of God's bleſſings which His Majeſty hath brought with unto this Land; No, put all our petty grieviances together, and heap them up to the height, they will appear as a Mole-Hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the Hiſtorians ſince then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Roſe and the White, for the greateſt happineſs (Chriſtian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from God, certainly, the peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, beſides the ſparing of our Britiſh Blood, heretofore, and during the difference, ſo often and abundantly ſhed, the ſtate of England is more aſſured, the Kingdom more enabled to recover her antient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conqueſts. It is true, that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the Duke of Parma, in the year 1588. joyned the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South-coaſt; and had His Majeſty at the ſame time declared himſelf againſt us in the North, it is eaſie to divine what had become of the Liberty of England: certainly, we would then, without murmur, have brought this Union a far greater praiſe than it hath ſince coſt us. It is true, that there was never any Common-weal, or Kingdom in the World, wherein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings live in the World, and not above it. They are not infinite, to examine every man's cauſe, or to relieve every man's wants. And yet, in the later (though to his own prejudice) His Majeſty hath had more compaſſion of other mens neceſſities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be ſaid, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis; Which, if other men do not underſtand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Majeſty, than of any King that ever England had; who, as well in divine, as in humane underſtanding hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Fin. comment in Sol. 1. K. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Majeſty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of preſumption, and withal ſuſpect, that it might befall theſe Papers of mine (though the loſs were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilful and common Painters, which, which, by her own commandment were knock'd in pieces, and caſt into the fire. For ill Artiſts, in ſetting out the Beauty of the external; and weak Writers, in deſcribing the Vertues of the internal; do often leave to Poſterity, of well formed faces, a deformed memory; and of the moſt Perfect and Princely minds, a moſt defective Repreſentation. It may ſuffice, and there needs no other diſcourſe; if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruel and turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom, for that purpoſe I have inſerted this brief Diſcourſe) with His Majeſties temperate, revengeleſs, and liberal diſpoſition; I ſay, that if the honeſt Reader weigh them juſtly, and with an even hand; and withall, but beſtow every deformed child on his true Parent; He ſhall find, that there is no man that hath ſo juſt a cauſe to complain, as the King himſelf hath. Now, as we have told the ſucceſs of the trumperies, and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Perſonages; ſo we find, that GOD is every where the ſame God. And, as it pleaſed him to puniſh the uſurpation and unnatural cruelty of Henry the Firſt, and of our Third Edward, in their Children for many Generations: ſo dealt he with the Sons of Loys Debonaire, the Son of Charles the Great, or Charlemain. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France had torn out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the Son of Pepin, the eldeſt Son of Charlemaine, and Heir of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in Priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his elder Brother; there followed nothing but murthers upon murthers, poiſoning, impriſonments, and civil War; till the whole Race of that famous Emperour was extinguiſhed. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelf of his Nephew by a violent death, and of his baſtard Brothers by a civil death (having incloſed them with ſure guard all the days of their lives, within a Monaſtery) held himſelf ſecure from all oppoſition; yet God raiſed up againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own Sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him priſoner, and to depoſe him; his own Sons, with whom (to ſatisfie their ambition) he had ſhared his eſtate, and given them Crowns to wear, and Kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldeſt Son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his firſt Wife, and one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition, that he had uſed violence towards his Brothers and Kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be ſlain. Eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit; Becauſe he uſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, and ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlain, whom he might have delivered. Step. Paſquier recher. l. 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings do; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which he performed in the General Aſſembly of the States, it follows: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat: After this, he did openly confeſs himſelf to have erred, and following the Example of the Emperour Theodoſius, he underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew. Paſq. Ibidem.

This he did, and it was praiſe-worthy. But the blood that is unjuſtly ſpilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

The King, as I have ſaid, had four Sons. To Lothaire his eldeſt, he gave the Kingdom of Italy, as Charlemaine his Father had done to Pepin, the Father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin, the ſecond Son, he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine; to Loys, the Kingdom of Bavier; and to Charles, whom he had by a ſecond Wife, called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But his ſecond Wife, being a mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire, to caſt his Son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles, which, after the death of his Son Pepin, he proſecuted to effect againſt his Grand-child bearing the ſame name. In the mean while, being invaded by his Son Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bavier, and Charles, afterward called the Bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyn in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt Brother. They fight near to Auxerre, the moſt bloody battel that ever was ſtrucken in France; in which, the marvellous loſs of Nobility, and men of War, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunns to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by Treaſon ſeizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter; Carloman rebels againſt his Father, Charles the Bald, the Father burns out the eyes of his Son Carloman; Bavier invades the Emperour Lothaire, his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, he is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his own conſcience, for his Rebellion againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monaſtery. Charles the Bald the Uncle, oppreſſeth his Nephews, the Sons of Lothaire, he uſurpeth the Empire, to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier, his elder Brother; Baviers Armies, and his Son Carloman, are beaten, he dies of grief, and the Uſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedechias a Jew, his Phyſician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drink. Beque had Charles the ſimple, and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breaks his neck, the younger is ſlain by a wild Boar; the Son of Bavier had the ſame ill deſtiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in ſporting with his companions. Charles the groſs becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany; wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the ſimple: but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Underſtanding; he dyes a diſtracted Beggar. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes, Major of the Palace, then by Robert, the Brother of Eudes; and laſtly, being taken by the Earl of Vermandois, he is forced to dye in the priſon of Peron. Loys the Son of Charles the ſimple breaks his neck in chaſing a Wolf; and of the two Sons of this Loys, the one dyes of poiſon, the other dyes in the Priſon of Orleans; after whom, Hugh Capet, of another Race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes himſelf King.

Theſe miſerable ends had the Iſſues of Debonaire; who after he had once apparelled Injuſtice with authority, his Sons and Succeſſors took up the faſhion, and wore that Garment ſo long without other proviſion, as when the ſame was torn from their ſhoulders, every man deſpiſed them as miſerable and naked Beggars. The wretched ſucceſs they had (ſaith a Learned Frenchman) ſhews, Que en ceſte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la juſtice; That in the death of that Prince; to wit, of Bernard the Son of Pepin the true Heir of Charlemain, men had more meddling, than God or Juſtice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the Firſt, one of the Worthieſt Kings (except for that Fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himſelf, after he had commended the deſtruction of the Proteſtants of Mirandol, and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murthered; men, women, and children. It is true that the ſaid King Francis repented himſelf of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his Son, to do Juſtice upon the murtherers, threatning his Son with GODS Judgements, if he neglected it. But this unſeaſonable care of his, God was not pleaſed to accept for payment. For after Henry was ſlain in ſport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautiful and vertuous Ladies; yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithſtanding their ſubtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Maſſacres upon thoſe of the Religion, and great effuſion of blood, the Crown was ſet on his Head, whom they all laboured to diſſolve; the Proteſtants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more ſtrong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now ſee if God be not the ſame God in Spain as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Caſtile; in reſpect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the Third, and the great Evan Vaſilowick of Muſcovia, were but petty ones: this Caſtilian, of all the Chriſtian and Heathen Kings, having been the moſt mercileſs. For, beſides thoſe of his own Blood and Nobility, which he had cauſed to be ſlain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis; the great Maſter of Calatrava, Ruis, Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and caſt into the ſtreets, denying him Chriſtian burial: I ſay, beſides theſe, and the ſlaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonſo Gomes, and the great Commander of Caſtile; he made away the two Infants of Arragon his Couſin-Germans, his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquergues, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Guttiere his Great Treaſurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he ſpare his two youngeſt Brothers, innocent Princes, whom after he had kept in cloſe Priſon from their Cradles, till one of them had lived ſixteen years, and the other fourteen; he murthered them there. Nay, he ſpared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Laſtly, as he cauſed the Arch-biſhop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed, of purpoſe to enjoy their Treaſures; ſo did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar, King of Barbary, with thirty ſeven of his Nobility, that came unto him for ſuccour, with a great ſumm of Money, to levy (by his favour) ſome Companies of Souldiers to return withal. Yea, he would needs aſſiſt the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in ſo much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-eſtabliſhed by the valour of the Engliſh Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaſter: He was ſtabbed to death by his younger Brother, the Earl of Aſtramara, who diſpoſſeſſed all his Children of their Inheritance, which, but for their Fathers injuſtice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any ſuch thing.

Hiſt. of Spain.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it muſt be Duke John of Burgoign, who after his traiterous murther of the Duke of Orleans, cauſed the Conſtable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Biſhops of Conſtance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earl of gran Pre, Hector of Chartes, and (in effect) all the Officers of Juſtice of the Chamber of Accompts, Treaſury, Requeſts (with ſixteen others to accompany them) to be ſuddenly and violently ſlain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have maſtered France; He was ſoon after ſtrucken with an Ax in the face, in the preſence of the Daulphin; and without any leiſure to repent his miſ-deeds, preſently ſlain. Theſe were the lovers of other mens miſeries: and miſeries found them out.

French invent. in anno 1418.

Now, for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the Seventh, Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon, was the firſt, and the firſt that laid the foundation of the preſent Auſtrian greatneſs. For this King did not content himſelf to hold Arra- gon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdom of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his Wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Niece, the Daughter of the last Henry; but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, he also cast his own Neece out of the Kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promise he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick, Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Blood, and by double alliance tyed unto him; sold them to the French; and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonsalvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politick King, who sold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son the Prince of Spain, the greatest Monarch of the World; saw him dye in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest Daughter married unto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugal, beheld her first Husband break his neck in her presence; and being with child by her second, dyed with it. A just Judgement of God upon the Race of Alphonso, now wholly extinguished; who had not only left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slain with his own hand, the Son and only comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutchess of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and dyed mad, and deprived. His third Daughter, bestowed on King Henry the Eighth, he saw cast off by the King; the Mother of many troubles in England; and the Mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeal, shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French; and dyed heart-broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdoms of Ferdinand have Masters of a new name; and by a strange Family are governed and possess'd.

Charles the Fifth, Son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vain enterprises upon the French, upon the Almans and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were consumed; who gave the while a most perillous entrance to the Turks, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and, in a sort, out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Inspurg: and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to swallow up all those Dominions; wherein he concocted nothing, save his own disgraces. And having after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in either, He crept into a Cloyster, and made himself a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the year, to his Son Philip, from whom he very slowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance. Nether. hist. l. 7. fol. 313.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand, (wrested by his Ancestors from Jaqueline, their lawful Princess) and to possess in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands; perswaded by that mischievous Cardinal of Granvile, and other Romish Tyrants; not only forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobility of those Countreys, not only forgot the Present made him upon his entry of forty Millions of Florens, called the Novaile aid; nor only forgot that he had twice most solemnly sworn to the General States, to maintain and preserve their antient Rights, Priviledges, and Customs, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, Conditional Princes of those Provinces: but beginning first to constrain them, and enthral them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intolerable Impositions, he lastly, by strong hand and main force, attempted to make himself not only an absolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Soveraigns of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their Natural and Fundamental Laws, Priviledges, and antient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a dispensation of his former Oaths (which Dispensation was the true cause of the War and Bloodshed since then;) and after he had tryed what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his base Sister Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinal Granvile; He employed that most mercileſs Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of strange Nations; by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captain, the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn; made away Montigue, and the Marques of Bergues, and cut off in those six years (that Alva Governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thousand and six hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murthers and massacres. By whose ministery, when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wished ends, having it in his hope to work that by subtilty which he had failed to perform by force, He sent for Governour, his bastard Brother, Don John of Austria, a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But he using the same Papal advantage that his Predecessors had done, makes no scruple to take Oath upon the holy Evangelists, to observe the Treaty made with the General States; and to discharge the Low-Countreys of all Spaniards, and other strangers therein garrisoned; Towards whose Pay and Pasport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make a payment of six hundred thousand pounds. Which Moneys received, he suddenly surprised the Hist. of the Netherlands.

Citadels of Antwerp and Nemures; not doubting (being unſuſpected by the States) to have poſſeſs'd himſelf of all the maſtering places of thoſe Provinces. For whatſoever he overtly pretended, he held in ſecret a contrary counſel with the Secretary Eſcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Miniſters of the Spaniſh Tyranny formerly practiſed, and now again intended. But let us now ſee the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Duke's cruelties. Firſt, for himſelf; after he had murthered ſo many of the Nobility; executed (as aforeſaid) eighteen thouſand ſix hundred in ſix years, and moſt cruelly ſlain Man, Woman, and Child in Mecklin, Zutphen, Narden, and other places; and after he had conſumed ſix and thirty Millions of Treaſure in ſix years, notwithſtanding his Spaniſh vaunt, That he would ſuffocate the Hollanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs; He departed the Countrey no otherwiſe accompanied, than with the curſe and deteſtation of the whole Nation; leaving His Majeſties Affairs in a ten-fold worſe eſtate than he found them at his firſt arrival. For Don John, whoſe haughty conceit of himſelf overcame the greateſt difficulties: though his judgement were over-weak to manage the leaſt: What wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealouſie and diſtruſt, with the untimely death that ſeized on him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Eſcovedo his ſharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Maſter, both England and the Netherlands; being ſent into Spain upon ſome new project, he was at his firſt arrival, and before any acceſs to the King, by certain Ruffians, appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murthered in his own lodging. Laſtly, if we conſider the King of Spain's carriage, his counſel and ſucceſs in this buſineſs, there is nothing left to the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thouſand Chriſtians, for the loſs of all thoſe Countreys, which for beauty, gave place to none; and for revenue, did equal his Weſt-Indies; for the loſs of a Nation which moſt willingly obeyed him; and who, at this day, after forty years War, are, in deſpight of all his forces, become a free Eſtate, and far more rich and powerful than they were, when he firſt began to impoveriſh and oppreſs them.

Oh! by what plots, by what for-ſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, impriſonments, tortures, poiſonings, and under what reaſons of State, and politick ſubtilty, have theſe fore-named Kings, both ſtrangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themſelves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent Miniſters! and in the end have brought thoſe things to paſs for their enemies, and ſeen an effect ſo directly contrary to all their own counſels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themſelves; and the other never have ſucceeded: if no ſuch oppoſition had ever been made. GOD hath ſaid, and performed it ever: Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum; I will deſtroy the wiſdom of the wiſe.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead; ſeeing the world is the ſame that it hath been; and the children of the preſent time, will ſtill obey their Parents? It is in the preſent time, that all the wits of the World are exerciſed. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawful; and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at leaſt we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our ſelves; or perſwade our ſelves, that GOD hath given us Letters Patents to purſue all our irreligious affections, with a Non obſtante; ſo we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joyned to the earth; we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, far off, and unſearchable; we have ſenſe and feeling of corporal things; and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are alſo earthly; and it is leſs to be wondred at, that the words of worthleſs men cannot cleanſe them; ſeeing their doctrine and inſtruction, whoſe underſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For, as the Prophet Eſay cryed out long ago, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Eſay complained then for himſelf and others: ſo are they leſs believed, every day after other. For, although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in every mans mouth, yea, in the diſcourſe of every woman, who, for the greateſt number are but Idols of Vanity; what is it other than an univerſal diſſimulation? We profeſs that we know GOD, but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life; for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non eſt divinorum cognitio, ſed vita divina. And certainly, there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the paſſionate diſpute, the perſonal hatred, and the perpetual war, maſſacres, and murthers, for Religion among Chriſtians; the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the World, as it hath well near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not ſoon reſolve, that took knowledge but of the religious diſputations among men, and not of their lives which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchaſe of Heaven; and that the World it ſelf were but uſed as it ought, and as an Inn, or place wherein to repoſe our ſelves in paſſing on towards our Celeſtial habitation? when on the contrary, beſides the Diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the Soul hath nothing but hypocriſie. We are all (in effect) become become Comedians in Religion; and while we act in geſture and voice, divine vertues, in all the courſe of our lives, we renounce our Perſons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Juſtice, and Truth, have but their being in terms, like the Philoſophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wiſdom, which Solomon defineth to be the School-Miſtreſs of the Knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the World; it is enough that we give it our good word: but the ſame which is altogether exerciſed in the ſervice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchaſe and obtain honour, with the many reſpects which attend it. Theſe indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our conſciences to the higheſt) we all ſhoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future; and yet, when we have gathered the greateſt abundance, we our ſelves enjoy no more thereof, than ſo much as belongs to one man. For the reſt, He that had the greateſt wiſdom, and the greateſt ability, that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the uſe: When goods increaſe (ſaith Solomon) they alſo increaſe that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for thoſe that devour the reſt, and follow us in fair weather; they again forſake us in the firſt tempeſt of misfortune, and ſteer away before the Sea and Wind; leaving us to the malice of our deſtinies. Of theſe, among a thouſand Examples, I will take but one out of Maſter Dannet, and uſe his own words: Whileſt the Emperour Charles the Fifth, after the reſignation of his eſtates, ſtayed at Uloſhing for Wind, to carry him his laſt journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embaſſadour, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius ſhould depart; the Emperour calling for ſome of his ſervants, and no body anſwering him, (for thoſe that attended upon him, were ſome gone to their lodgings, and all the reſt aſleep) the Emperour took up the Candle himſelf, and went before Seldius, to light him down the Stairs; and ſo did, notwithſtanding all the reſiſtance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the Stairs foot, he ſaid thus unto him; Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he ſhall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou haſt known in thy time environed with ſo many mighty Armies and Guards of Souldiers, thou haſt alſo ſeen alone, abandoned, and forſaken, yea, even of his own ſervants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of God, which I will by no means go about to withſtand. Eccleſ. 5. 10.

But you will ſay, that there are ſome things elſe, and of greater regard than the former. The firſt is, the reverend reſpect that is held of Great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all ſorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their Juſtice and Piety, accompany the outward worſhip given to their places and power; without which, what is the applauſe of the multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who without the knowledg of any true cauſe, pleaſe themſelves with the noiſe they make? For, ſeeing it is a thing exceeding rare to diſtinguiſh Vertue and Fortune; the moſt impious (if proſperous) have ever been applauded; the moſt vertuous (if unproſperous) have ever been deſpiſed. For, as Fortunes man rides the Horſe, ſo Fortune her ſelf rides the Man. Who when he is deſcended, and on foot; the Man taken from his Beaſt, and Fortune from the Man; a baſe Groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt ſpurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The ſecond is, the greatning of our proſterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of thoſe which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be ſaid of them which Lactantius ſpake of certain Heathen Philoſophers; Quod ſapientes ſunt in re ſtulta. For, when our ſpirits immortal ſhall be once ſeparate from our mortal bodis, and diſpoſed by GOD; there remaineth in them no other joy of their poſterity which ſucceed, than there doth of pride in that ſtone, which ſleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace, nor any other ſorrow for their poverty, than there doth of ſhame in that which beareth up a Beggars cottage. Neſciunt mortui, etiam ſancti, quod agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non interſunt; The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children; for the Souls of thoſe departed, are not converſant with their affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Auguſtine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our Sons ſhall be honourable; nither ſhall we underſtand concerning them, whether they ſhall be of low degree. Which Eccleſiaſtes alſo confirmeth; Man walketh in a ſhadow, an diſquieteth himſelf in vain; he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who ſhall gather them. The living (ſaith he) know that they ſhall die, but the dead know nothing at all; for who can ſhew unto man, what ſhall be after him under the Son? He therefore accounteth it among the reſt of worldly vanities, to labour and travel in the World; not knowing after death, whether a fool or a wiſe man ſhould enjoy the fruts thereof; which made me (ſaith he) endeavour even to abhorr mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whoſe bleſſed or ſorrowful eſtates after death, God hath reſerved? Mans knowledge lying but in his hope, ſeeing the Prophet Eſay confeſſeth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us and Iſrael knows us not. But hereof we are aſſured, that the long and dark night of death (of whoſe following day we ſhall never behold the dawn till his return that hath triumphed over it) ſhall cover us over till the world be no more; After which, and when we ſhall again again receive Organs glorified, and incorruptible, the ſeats of Angelical affections; in ſo great admiration ſhall the Souls of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſs joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection towards Friends, Kindred, or Children. Of whom, whether we ſhall retain any particular knowledge, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them, no man can aſſure us; and the wiſeſt men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of thoſe faculties, which the Soul exerciſed in a mortal body; we ſhall not at that time ſo divide the joyes of Heaven, as to caſt any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the World. No, be their eſtates greater than ever the World gave, we ſhall (by the difference known unto us) even deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoever comfort ſhall remain of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the charity, which we exerciſed living: and in that Piety, Juſtice, and firm Faith, for which it pleaſed the Infinite Mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unneceſſary and vain? Certainly, no. For that Infinite Wiſdom of God, which hath diſtinguiſhed his Angels by degrees; which hath given greater and leſs light and beauty to heavenly bodies; which hath made differences between Beaſts and Birds; created the Eagle and the Flie, the Cedar, and the Shrub; and among Stones, given the faireſt tincture to the Ruby, and quickeſt light to the Diamond; hath alſo ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people; Magiſtrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And, as Honour is left to Poſterity, for a mark and enſign of the vertue and underſtanding of their Anceſtors; ſo (ſeeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary; and, that Titles, without proportionable eſtates, fall under the miſerable ſuccour of other mens pity) I account it fooliſhneſs to condemn ſuch a care; Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raiſe not our own buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth firſt prefer the perfection of bodily health; ſecondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæſitas: ſo Jeremy cries, Wo unto them that erect their houſes by unrighteouſneſs, and their chambers without equity; And Eſay the ſame, Wo to thoſe that ſpoil, and were not ſpoiled. And it was out of the true wiſdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of violence; not to lye in wait for blood; and not to ſwallow them up alive, whoſe riches we covet; for ſuch are the wayes (ſaith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

Jer. 22. 13. Eſa. 33. Prov. 1. 18, 12. Prov. 23. 1, 2, 8, 9. & 25. 9. 8.

And, if we could afford our ſelves but ſo much leiſure, as to conſider, That he which hath moſt in this world, hath, in reſpect of the world, nothing in it; and that he which hath the longeſt time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, ſetting it either by that which is paſt, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we ſhall abide for ever; I ſay, if both, to wit, our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of underſtanding, that we ſo much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being; and ſo much neglect the other, which hath no ending; coveting thoſe mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting thoſe things which are immortal, as if our ſelves, after the World, were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wiſdom, as he pleaſeth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger eſteem all negligent, that have not troden down their oppoſites; the Politician all groſs, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet, when we once come in ſight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, and when, by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end; Then it is, I ſay, that our own cogitations (thoſe ſad and ſevere cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermoſt for all the pleaſing paſſages of our lives paſt. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our ſelves can no longer exerciſe cruelty to others; and it is only then, that we are ſtrucken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That God will not be mocked. For if, according to S. Peter, The righteous ſcarcely be ſaved: and that God ſpared not his Angels; where ſhall thoſe appear, who, having ſerved their appetites all their lives, preſume to think, that the ſevere Commandments of the All-powerful God were given but in ſport; and that the ſhort breath, which we draw when death preſſeth us, if we can but faſhion it to the ſound of Mercy (without any kind of ſatisfaction or amends) is ſufficient? O quam multi, ſaith a reverend Father, cum hac ſpe ad æternos labores & bella deſcendunt! I confeſs, that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it ſaid, That we ended well; for we all deſire (as Balaam did) to dye the death of the righteous. But, what ſhall we call a diſ-eſteeming, an oppoſing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if thoſe men do not oppoſe him, diſ-eſteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveneſs at leiſure, with the remainder and laſt drawing of a malicious breath? For, what do they otherwiſe, that dye this kind of well-dying, but ſay unto God, as followeth? We beſeech thee, O God, that all the falſhoods, forſwearings, and treacheries of our lives paſt, may be pleaſing unto thee; that thou wilt for our ſakes (that have had no leiſure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impoſſible) and forget to be a juſt God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppreſſions, call ambition wiſdom, and charity fooliſhneſs. For I ſhall prejudice my Son (which I am reſolved not to do) if I make reſtitution; and confeſs my ſelf to have been unjuſt (which I am too proud to do)

Gal. 6. 7. 1 Pet. 4.

if I deliver the oppreſſed. Certainly, theſe wiſe worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood, ſuch a Leaden One, as Lewis the Eleventh ware on his Cap; which, when he had cauſed any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head, and kiſs it; beſeeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it ſhould be the laſt; which (as at other times) he did, when, by the practice of a Cardinal, and a falſified Sacrament, he cauſed the Earl of Armagnac to be ſtabbed to death; mockeries indeed, fit to be uſed towards a Leaden, but not towards the Ever-living, GOD. But of this compoſition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureleſs and ridiculous; they fear the plots and practices of their oppoſites, and their very whiſperings; they fear the Opinions of men, which beat but upon ſhadows; they flatter and forſake the proſperous and unproſperous, be they Friends or Kings; yea, they dive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble-ſtone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerful hand; and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and Giant-like valour againſt the terrible judgements of the All-powerful God; yea, they ſhew themſelves Gods againſt God, and Slaves towards men; towards men, whoſe bodies and conſciences are alike rotten.

Now, for the reſt; If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppreſſed, whom we accompt wretched; we ſhall find the happineſs of the one, and the miſerable eſtate of the other, ſo tied by God to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubject to enterchange (witneſs the ſudden downfall of the greateſt Princes, and the ſpeedieſt upriſing of the meaneſt perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certain, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo uncertain, whereof to bewail it ſelf. For, there is no man ſo aſſured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next hour, or day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt; what the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (ſaith S. James) what ſhall be to morrow. To day he is ſet up, and to morrow he ſhall not be found; for he is turned into duſt, and his purpoſe periſheth. And although the air which compaſſeth adverſity, be very obſcure; yet therein we better diſcern God, than in that ſhining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearneſs thereof, there is no vanity which eſcapeth our ſight. And let adverſity ſeem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themſelves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to thoſe under the croſs, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For, be it that we have lived many years, and according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoyced; or be it that we have meaſured the ſame length of dayes, and therein have evermore ſorrowed; yet, looking back from our preſent being, we find both the one and the other; to wit, the joy and wo, ſailed out of ſight; and death, which doth purſue us, and hold us in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro eſt, mors tenet; whatſoever of our age is paſt, death holds it. So, as whoſoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a ſervant, and the Time a friend; let him but take the accompt of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleaſures paſt) and truly examine what he hath reſerved, either of Beauty and Youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath ſaved, that it might laſt, of his deareſt affections, or of whatever elſe the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he ſhall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of theſe diſſolutions, than heavy, ſecret, and ſad ſighs. He ſhall find nothing remaining, but thoſe ſorrows, which grow up after our faſt-ſpringing youth, overtake it, when it is at a ſtand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither; in ſo much as looking back from the very inſtant time, and from our now being, the poor, diſeaſed, and captive creature, hath as little ſenſe of all his former miſeries and pains, as he, that is moſt bleſſed in common Opinion, hath of his fore-paſſed pleaſure and delights. For whatſoever is caſt behind us, is juſt nothing; and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it: Omnia quæ eventura ſunt, in incerto jacent. Only thoſe few black Swans I muſt except; who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear, and embrace both, as neceſſary guides to endleſs glory.

For my ſelf, this is my conſolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the ſorrows of this life are but of two ſorts; whereof the one hath reſpect to GOD; the other to the World. In the firſt, we complain to GOD againſt our ſelves, for our offences againſt him; and confeſs, Et tu juſtus es in omnibus quæ venerunt ſuper nos; And thou, O Lord, art juſt in all that hath befallen us. In the ſecond, we complain to our ſelves againſt GOD; as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, anſwering our appetites; or for taking them from us having had them; forgetting that humble and juſt acknowledgement of Job; The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the firſt of which, S. Paul hath promiſed bleſſedneſs; to the ſecond, death. And out of doubt, he is either a fool, or ingrateful to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean ſoever his eſtate be, that the ſame is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him; or doth not acknowledge, how ſharp ſoever his afflictions be, that the ſame are yet far leſs, than thoſe which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wiſe man call the adverſities of the World but tributa vivendi; the tributes of living: a wiſe Chriſtian man ought to know them, and bear them as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and reſolvedly, and not as thoſe whining Souldiers do, Qui gementes ſequuntur Imperatorem.

For ſeeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their diſtribution, been partial to the moſt mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greateſt Emperour, and the part of the moſt miſerable Beggar; a Beggar, begging Water of an Enemy to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Seignior of the Turks in the morning, and in the ſame day, the Footſtool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had alſo played, being taken by Sapores) that made Belliſarius play the moſt victorious Captain, and laſtly, the part of a blind Beggar; of which, examples of many thouſands may be produced: why ſhould other men, who are but as the leaſt Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly, there is no other accompt to be made of this ridiculous World, than to reſolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the leſs. For, when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now, if any man out of weakneſs priſe the paſſages of this world otherwiſe (for, ſaith Petrarch, Magni ingenii eſt revocare mentem à ſenſibus) it is by reaſon of that unhappy fantaſie of ours, which forgeth in the brains of Man all the miſeries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is ſubject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adverſity work all that they work. For, ſeeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatſoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a fooliſh madneſs in the ſhipwrack of worldly things, where all ſinks but the Sorrow, to ſave it. That were, as Seneca ſaith, Fortunæ ſuccumbere, quod triſtius eſt omni fato; To fall under Fortune, of all other the moſt miſerable deſtiny.

But it is now time to ſound a retreat, and to deſire to be excuſed of this long purſuit; and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time paſt (which we call Hiſtory) in ſo large a Table, may alſo be accepted in place of a better reaſon.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the firſt divine Hiſtories being nothing elſe but a continuation of ſuch examples) have perſwaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For, though theſe two glorious actions of the Almighty be ſo near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one neceſſarily implyeth the other; Creation inferring Providence (for what father forſaketh the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence preſuppoſing Creation; Yet many of thoſe that have ſeemed to excel in worldly wiſdom, have gone about to diſ-joyn this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Ariſtotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now, although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for, by Faith, we underſtand that the World was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a work for Ariſtotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithſtanding) founded the Defences and Fortreſſes of all his Verbal Doctrine; yet that the neceſſity of Infinite power, and the Worlds beginning, and the impoſſibility of the contrary, even in the judgement of Natural reaſon, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no leſs ſtrange, that thoſe men which are deſirous of knowledge (ſeeing Ariſtotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the reſt) have ſo retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of Truth, and ſo abſolutely ſubjected themſelves to the law of thoſe Philoſophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the ſearch of cauſes, they have condemned, either for phantaſtical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Poſitions of Heathen Philoſophers are undoubtedly Grounds and Principles indeed, becauſe ſo called? Or, that ipſi dixerunt, doth make them to be ſuch? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reaſon hath built any thing ſo ſtrong againſt it ſelf, as the ſame reaſon can hardly aſſail it, much leſs batter it down: the ſame in every queſtion of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamental Law of humane knowledge. For, ſaith Charron, in his Book of Wiſdom, Tout propoſition humaine a autant d' authorite quel' autre, ſi la raiſon n' on fait la difference; Every humane propoſition hath equal authority, if reaſon make not a difference: the reſt, being but the Fables of Principles. But hereof, how ſhall the upright and impartial judgement of man give a Sentence, where oppoſition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And, to this purpoſe, it was well ſaid of Lactantius, Sapientiam ſibi adimunt, qui ſine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur; They neglect their own wiſdom, who without any judgement approve the invention of thoſe that fore-went them; and ſuffer themſelves, after the manner of Beaſts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which ſloth and dulneſs, ignorance is now become ſo powerful a Tyrant, as it hath ſet true Philoſophy, Phyſick and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the firſt, Contra negantem principia; over the ſecond, Virtus ſpecifica; and over the third, Eccleſia Romana.

Lact. de orig. Erroris, l. 2. c. 8.

But for my ſelf, I ſhall never be perſwaded, that God hath ſhut up all the light of Learning within the Lanthorn of Ariſtotle's brains; or, that it was ever ſaid unto him, as unto Eſdræ,

Accendam

Accendam in corde tuo Lucernam intellectus; That God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they only invaded Nature, and found the ſtrength and bottom thereof; the ſame Nature having conſumed all her ſtore, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That theſe, and theſe, be the cauſes of theſe and theſe effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reaſon; and ſo hath Experience without Art. The Cheeſe-wife knoweth it as well as the Philoſopher, that ſowre Rennet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But, if we ask a reaſon of this cauſe, why the ſowreneſs doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philoſophy, to ſatisfie this, and many other like vulgar queſtions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the leaſt things, who cannot give a true reaſon for the Graſs under his feet, why it ſhould be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet diſcover the way and reaſon of Natures working, in thoſe which are far leſs noble Creatures than himſelf; who is far more noble than the Heavens themſelves: Man (ſaith Solomon) that can hardly diſcern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath ſo ſhort a time in the World, as he no ſooner begins to learn, than to dye; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his underſtanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Eſſence of his own Soul, and which the wiſeſt of the Naturaliſts (if Ariſtotle be he) could never ſo much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any elſe doth know, but GOD that created it (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, ſaith Job.) Man, I ſay, that is but an Idiot in the next cauſe of his own life, and in the cauſe of all actions of his life: will (notwithſtanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (ſaith Job) is ſo excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will diſable God's power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Motes of the Air for a cauſe; caſt the work on neceſſity or chance; beſtow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of Form; and laſtly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternal; which latter Opinion Ariſtotle, to make himſelf the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World; and his Sectators have maintained it; Parati ac conjurati, quos ſequantur Philoſophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or ſoon after Moſes, Zoroaſter, Muſæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Meliſſus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whoſe Opinions are exquiſitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the neceſſity of invincible reaſon, One Eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the Univerſal. Horum omnium ſententia quamvis ſit incerta, eòdem tamen ſpectat, ut providentiam unam eſſe conſentiant: ſive enim Natura, ſive Æther, ſive Ratio, ſive Mens, ſive Fatalis Neceſſitas, ſive divina Lex, idem eſt quod à nobis dicitur Deus; All theſe mens Opinions (ſaith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this; That they agree upon one Providence, whether the ſame be Nature, or Light, or Reaſon, or Underſtanding, or Deſtiny, or divine Ordinance, that it is the ſame which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the World, though they have divers riſings, and divers runnings; though they ſometimes hide themſelves for a while under ground, and ſeem to be loſt in Sea-like Lakes; do at laſt find, and fall into, the great Ocean: ſo after all the ſearches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philoſophical contemplation and curioſity, in the neceſſity of this Infinite power, all the reaſon of Man ends and diſſolves it ſelf.

Lact. 5.

As for others: and firſt touching thoſe which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternal, and, that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexiſtente; the Suppoſition is ſo weak, as is hardly worth the anſwering. For (ſaith Euſebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere; They ſeem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune; inſomuch as if God had not found this firſt matter by chance, He had never been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Univerſal. For, were the Matter or Chaos eternal; it then follows, That either this ſuppoſed Matter did fit it ſelf to God, or God accommodate himſelf to the matter. For the firſt; it is impoſſible, that things without ſenſe could proportion themſelves to the Work-mans Will. For the ſecond; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applyed himſelf, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

Euſeb. de præp. Evang. l. 7. c. 8.

But let it be ſuppoſed, That this matter hath been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe; I would gladly learn how it came to paſs, that the ſame was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe; and no more, nor no leſs, than ſerved to receive the form of the Univerſal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was ſufficient; then muſt it be granted, That God created out of nothing ſo much of new matter, as ſerved to finiſh the work of the World: Or, had there been more of this matter than ſufficed, then God did diſſolve and annihilate whatſoever remained and was ſuperfluous. And this muſt every reaſonable Soul confeſs, That it is the ſame work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the ſame Art and Power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternal matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not; at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus; There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do bodies compound themselves.

For the rest, Those that feign this matter to be eternal, must of necessity confess, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter, left no place for infinite form; but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part, whosoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternal deformity, or in eternal dead matter, than in eternal light, and eternal life; let eternal death be his reward. For, it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth terms to express it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow; quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form; yea, for as many worlds (if such had been Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation than the work-mans will. Yea, Reason it self finds it more easie for Infinite power, to deliver from it self a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and dust, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words; Deus in una existentia omnia præhabet; and again, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the World Universal closed up all of GOD: For the most part of his works (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his Wisdom be opened by the glorious work of the World; which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldom entitle GOD The All shewing, or The All-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

Cap. 16. v. 21.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, inferr the Worlds eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternal being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [Nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Natural Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor, Aristotle himself confesseth, Quod omnes Antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum: That all the Ancients decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite; and a little after, more largely, and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere: it is strange, that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For, if we compare the World Universal, and all the unmeasurable Orbs of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum, it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore, Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the World Universal, but, particulam Universitatis & infinitatis; a parcel of that which is the Universality, and the Infinity it self: And Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to prove the Worlds eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the World universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the World (to wit, an Almighty God) in his Antecedent; and the same God to be a God restrained in his Conclusion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work, matter being present: As Fire, to burn things combustible. Again, he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterwards work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act: But God (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being alwayes the same, doth alwayes work. Whence he concludeth, If the World were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof; and therefore eternal. The answer to this is very easie; For that Gods performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him.

Steuc. Eug. l. 3. c. 9. ex Aristot. Phys. 3. 20.

For

For the ſame action of his will, which made the World for ever, did alſo with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this anſwer, in it ſelf-ſufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be ſaid to be eternal; which the Platonicks call Spiritualem mundum; and do in this ſort diſtinguiſh the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritualis eſt mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali eſt Architecto, fuit ſemper cum illo, eritque ſemper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod ſecundum opus eſt Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit ſemper: retinet alteram, quia ſit ſemper futurus: That repreſentative, or the intentional word (ſay they) the ſamplar of this viſible world, the firſt work of GOD, was equally antient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever ſhall be. This material world, the ſecond work or creature of GOD, doth differ from the Worker in this, that it was not from everlaſting; and in this it doth agree, that it ſhall be for ever to come; The firſt point, That it was not for ever, all Chriſtians confeſs: The other they underſtand no otherwiſe, than that after the conſummation of this world, there ſhall be a new Heaven, and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of theſe things we need not here ſtand to argue; though ſuch opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this conſideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cauſe, producing a changeable and temporal effect; Touching which point, Proclus the Platoniſt diſputeth, That the compounded Eſſence of the World (and becauſe compounded, therefore diſſipable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inſeparable power, flowing from Divine unity; and that the Worlds natural appetite of God ſheweth, that the ſame proceedeth from a good and underſtanding divine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, muſt be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlaſtingly continue and preſerve the ſame. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (ſaith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, ſucceſſively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material World is not all together; but the aboliſhed parts are departed by ſmall degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the ſame ſmall degrees ſucceed, as the ſhadow of a tree in a River, ſeemeth to have continued the ſame a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

Mar. Ficin. de immort. Animæ, l. 18. c. 1.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it ſhall have any end, and to this purpoſe affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never ſeen, no, not by any reaſon perceived, that the Heavens have ever ſuffered corruption; or that they appear any way the older by continuance; or in any ſort otherwiſe than they were; which had they been ſubject to final corruption, ſome change would have been diſcerned in ſo long a time. To this it is anſwered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newneſs, and that they have not continued ſo long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive anſwer by conjectures; it then ſeemeth, that ſome alteration may be found. For either Ariſtotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were groſly miſtaken; or elſe thoſe parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reaſon of the Sun's heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial navigable. But we know by experience, that thoſe Regions ſo ſcituate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, paſſable enough. We read alſo many Hiſtories of Deluges; and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Suns violent heat.

Ariſt. Met. 2. Plin. l. 2. c. 8. Strab. l. 3. Beda de ratione tem. 11. c. 32. Thom. p. 1. q. 102. art. 2.

But in a word, this Obſervation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, have ſtood two or three thouſand years; that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as ſuppoſed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration, either of ſubſtance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldeſt times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alterations ſhould we look for in Celeſtial and Quinteſſential bodies? And yet we have reaſon to think, that the Sun, by whoſe help all creatures are generate, doth not in theſe latter Ages aſſiſt Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, ſuch as the eldeſt World had, nor Mighty Men, ſuch as the elder World had; but all things in general are reputed of leſs vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Diſcourſe, we might eaſily fetch ſtore of proof; as well that this World ſhall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I ſee no good Anſwer that can be to this Objection: If the World were eternal; why not all things in the World eternal? If there were no firſt, no Cauſe, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehenſible Wiſdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more rational than every other Nature; Why had not the eternal reaſon of Man, provided for his eternal Being in the World? For, if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why ſhould Heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of Men rot and dye?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Centre, and gave order that it ſhould hang in the Air; that the Sun ſhould travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed thoſe bounds, nor fail to perform that Progreſs once in every year; the Moon to live by borrowed light; the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to be faſtned like nails in a Cart-wheel; and the Planets to wander at their pleaſure? Or, if none of theſe had power over other; was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within thoſe two Circles, hath viſited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this courſe in all eternity; He may juſtly be called eternal Charity, and everlaſting Love. The ſame may be ſaid of all the Stars, who being all of them moſt large and clear fountains of vertue and operation, may alſo be called eternal Vertues; the Earth may be called eternal Patience; the Moon, an eternal Borrower, and Beggar; and Man, of all other the moſt miſerable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by Millions, than ever Heſiodus dream'd of. But inſtead of this mad folly, we ſee it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes: and the eyes of our reaſon diſcern it better; That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and conſtrained; themſelves they have not conſtrained, nor could. Omne determinatum cauſam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit; Every thing hath ſome efficient cauſe, by which it is bounded.

Now, for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the School of Ariſtotle hath both commended many errours unto us, and ſought alſo thereby to obſcure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, ſhining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World; ſo if the beſt definition be taken out of the ſecond of Ariſtotle's Phyſicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphyſicks, I ſay, that the beſt is but nominal, and ſerving only to difference the beginning of Natural motion from Artificial: which yet the Academicks open better; when they call it, A Seminary ſtrength, infuſed into matter by the Soul of the World; who give the firſt place to Providence, the ſecond to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they underſtand GOD) Dux & Caput; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodiens; Natura poſtremum. But be it what it will, or be it any of theſe (God excepted) or participating of all; yet that it hath choice or underſtanding (both which are neceſſarily in the cauſe of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanſwerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut ſcientiam; He only can be ſaid to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

Ficin. de Plat. But the will and ſcience of Nature, are in theſe words truly expreſſed by Ficinus: Poteſt ubique Natura, vel per diverſa media, vel ex diverſis materiis, diverſa facere; ſublata vero mediorum materiarumque diverſitate, vel unicum, vel ſimillimum operatur, neque poteſt quando adeſt materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diverſity of means, or out of diverſity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diverſity of means, and the diverſity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being preſent. Now, if Nature made choice of diverſity of matter, to work all theſe variable works of Heaven and Earth, it had then both underſtanding and will; it had counſel to begin; reaſon to diſpoſe; vertue and knowledge to finiſh, and power to govern; without which, all things had been but one and the ſame; all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And, if we grant Nature this will, and this underſtanding, this counſel, this reaſon, and power; Cur natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould we then call ſuch a cauſe rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the firſt and higheſt place to divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omneſque ſummum locum divino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay, in ſhort, that it is a true effect of true reaſon in man (were there no authority more binding than reaſon) to acknowledge and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime power. Vera Philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True Philoſophy is an aſcending from the things which flow, and riſe, and fall, to the things that are for ever the ſame.

Lact. de ira Dei l. 1. c. 10.

Ariſt. l. 1. de Cælo. c. 3. T. 22.

For the reſt; I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety, monſtrous, to confound God and Nature; be it but in terms. For it is God, that only diſpoſeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, veſſels of honour and diſhonour: It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all; it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth. It is Nature that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth, nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelf; Nature nothing in it ſelf. It is God which is the Father, and hath begotten all things; it is Nature which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it ſelf it exiſteth not. For, ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in Fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these; by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore, seeing all things work as they do (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you please) yet, because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power; we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder; and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it self, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfections. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit; That there is a power Infinite, and eternal (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith and Reason; without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by divine Letters, as the waters of a running River do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

Thus much, I say, it is, that Reason it self hath taught us; and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur; quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows; because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience, Plato calleth absolati boni scientiam, The Science of the absolute good: And another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Isidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: Fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confess it, That to enquire further, as of the Essence of God, of his Power, of his Art, and by what mean he created the World; Or of his secret judgement, and the causes, is not an affect of Reason; Sed cum ratione insaniunt; but they grow mad with reason, that enquire after it: For, as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Authour) de faire arrest au but qu'on nascen surpasser; For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to pass on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knows the end of his own Art. For, seeing both Reason and Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humunam mersi) that the World was made by a Power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakned, but greatly strengthned by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

Lact. l. 4. c. 4. de vera sapientia.

Isaac de defin.

Quod est infinitum, & non secundum naturam terminatum, non continetur a scientia. Arist. poster.

I have been already over-long, to make any large Discourse, either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuse; especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsuitable division of the Books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first Part finished. All men know, that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little, ipsi nobis furto subducimur; We are stollen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I believe as he doth; That who so thinks himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable Ignorant, Those that are the best men of War, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from their selves; from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally, concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counsel from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the first Part; and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Posterity; some few enterprises, greater in Fame than Faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of Time, and preserved it self from the very Cradle and beginning to this day; and yet not so entire, but that the large Discourses thereof (to which, in many Scriptures, we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the Actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same Time, I am driven to relate by way of digression; of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto ;
They appear here and there, floating in the great gulf of Time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us ; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws ; they had their diversity of Government ; they had Kingly rule ; Nobility ; Policy in War ; Navigation, and all, or the most of needful Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a general History we should have left a great deal of Nakedness by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have also made many others ; which, if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of humane errour. For, seeing we digress in the wayes of our lives ; yea, seeing the life of Man is nothing else but digression ; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the kinds.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman, Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles ; and every day preach'd unto us. But we still make large digressions ; yea, the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldæans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found : it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire ; whilest it so flourished, that the affairs of the Nations adjoyning had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the Fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians ; as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empire, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement : it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers ; who seldom give names to these small Brooks, whereof many joyned together, make great Rivers ; till such time as they become united, and run in main stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, and the Style not every where like it self ; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent ; the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Æneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first Book, and elsewhere, in which language others may think, and my self acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant ; but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in Latine Characters in S. Senensis ; and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say, I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, having had an eleven years leisure to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other Tongue ; Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own Times, having been permitted to draw water as near the Well-head as another. To this I answer, That whosoever in writing a modern History, shall follow Truth too near the heels, it may haply strike out his Teeth. There is no Mistress or Guide that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself ; and he that walks after her at a middle distance ; I know not whether I should call that kind of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens Opinions, when I might have made the best use of them ; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, do yet (when Death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest Times ; wherein also, why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and tax the Vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead ; and have it laid to my charge ? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly, if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find find fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsly.

For, I protest before the Majesty of God, that I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is, to please all ; seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I : Unus mihi pro populo erat ; and to the same effect, Epicurus, Hæc ego non multis, sed tibi ; (or as it hath since lamentably fallen fallen out) I may borrow the reſolution of an antient Philoſopher, Satis eſt unus, Satis eſt nullus. For it was for the ſervice of that ineſtimable Prince, Henry, the ſucceſſive hope, and one of the greateſt of the Chriſtian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleaſed him to peruſe ſome part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſs. It is now left to the World without a Maſter; from which, all that is preſented, hath received both blows and thanks: Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus eſt omnis judicii, in quo lis ſecundum plures datur But theſe Diſcourſes are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably; ſo againſt thoſe, qui gloriantur in malitia, my preſent adverſity hath diſarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall; and for riſing again, as in the Natural privation, there is no receſſion to habit; ſo it is ſeldom ſeen in the privation politick. I do therefore forbear to ſtile my Readers, Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions; or to promiſe a ſecond and third Volume (which I alſo intend) if the firſt receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never ſo many courteous Phraſes, yet ſhall we evermore be thought fools, that write fooliſhly. For concluſion, all the hope I have, lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well deſerving of them, than ever I ſhall do again. For had it been otherwiſe; I ſhould hardly have had this leiſure to have made my ſelf a Fool in Print.

THE LIFE OF Sir WALTER RALEIGH.

I Determine to write the Life, the Riſe, Fortunes, and End of Walter Raleigh, Knight; his Memoirs being certainly worthy to be tranſmitted to Poſterity, who hath been ſo ſucceſsfully induſtrious in retrieving the Actions of former Ages from the Ruines of Time, even in its very Infancy, in a well-compil'd, maſculine, and learned Hiſtory of the World. The Image of ſo great a Perſon ſhould not be quite loſt, though drawn in little, which deſerves to be pourtraid by the greateſt Maſters of Policy, and with the boldeſt Touches. Indeed his Shadows cannot now be well left exact, ſeeing they muſt be taken ſo long after his Death; when Time hath defac'd his beſt Features, and ſhed Oblivion on the moſt beautiful of his Actions. Who follows Truth (as Sir Walter has wiſely remarqu'd) too near the heels, may have his teeth ſtruck out: and he that goes after her, oft loſeth her ſight, and himſelf too. Diſtance of time doth ſometimes, like ſome mediums, make the ſtreighteſt Actions ſeem crooked, and ſometimes gives them the advantage of Landſcapes, which appear taking and agreeable afar off, though when nearly ſearch'd, and pry'd into by a curious and intelligent Eye, they ſeem rude, harſh, and unpleaſant. We muſt therefore diſpair of a juſt and exact Account of him, unleſs we could by ſome Magick power (as the Author of a Pamphlet has done, to terrify and make Gondamore ſpeak the truth) raiſe him from the dead, and converſe a while with his Ghoſt. I ſhall however with what imperfect Clue our Hiſtories have bequeath'd, trace him through the various Labyrinths of Fortune, and take a Proſpect of him in the ſeveral Scenes of Court and Camp, Peace and War, till I have followed him to the Scaffold, the place of his much lamented and unhappy End; keeping as near as I can a medium between thoſe who in their Annals drive on with an implicit faith; and thoſe, who to get the reputation of Obſervers and men of Reach, ſteal into the private Receſſes of Princes, and diſrobe Majeſty it ſelf to find ſome Deformities, which love to their Prince, and intereſt of State ſhould cover; The beſt vail for all deform'd Actions.

In his Preface to the Hiſtory of the World.

I find him born at a place, call'd Budely, or Budliegh, in the County of Devon, in an houſe which his Family had long poſſeſt, call'd Hays: A County (as Mr. Cambden has obſerv'd) renown'd among forreign Nations for the Valour of the Inhabitants in Sea-Services of all ſorts. That Spain thought ſo, Sir Francis Drake, with many others of that County, as well as our Sir Walter, are very convincing Arguments.

In his Britannia.

That he was well deſcended, was never yet queſtioned, but by my Lord of Oxon, who indeed was wont to call him the Jack, and Upſtart. But theſe were words which only Envy and Emulation could extort, and every one very eaſily confute.

Indeed that he was a Gentleman, becauſe a Favourite, was no ill Argument among the Polititians of thoſe Times, if we may believe a Secretary of State, who hath left this as a Maxim then, That the Queen through her whole Reign never was guilty of creation, never in her choice took into her Favour a meer new man, or a Mechanick.

Sir Robert Nanton.

That he was but poor in the beginning ſeems not ſtrange, if we conſider him the youngeſt Brother, and the Fortunes of his Family much diminiſhed by the Generoſity (if not Prodigality) of his Anceſtors. But the wants of Fortune are often recompenc'd with the richer gifts of the Mind; Nature foreſeeing the diſability of his Eſtate, ſtock'd him with a larger portion of Senſe, bequeath'd him the fairer Patrimony of a faithful Memory, plauſible Tongue, ſtrong Wit, and ſolid Judgment.

But becauſe the natural Endowments of the Mind, though never ſo great, are capable of advancement by the help of Education, he reſolved for one of the Univerſities. Oxon had the happineſs to own him, where I find him in Oriel Colledg. His ſlender Fortune, and his active Genius, always pointed with a reſtleſs Ambition, would not let him ſettle here, ſo that he could only (like a Spy) take a tranſient view of, or (like an haſty Enemy) make ſome incurſions and inrodes into thoſe parts of Learning, which he afterwards conquered, and was entirely Maſter of.

Therefore that he might the better feed thoſe Hopes Ambition had kindled in his thoughts, and remove nearer to the Miſtreſs he courted; He reſolved for one of the Inns of Court, which he knew were always places of Eſteem with the Queen, who would ſay, they fitted Youth for the future. Here he ſpent his time, and improved himſelf in the intricate knowledg of our Laws, and in the ſtudies of all manly and real Accompliſhments.

But he ſtaid not long here neither, for Fate it ſeems would have him of the Sword firſt. Yet though he laid aſide his Gown, it was not with a deſign of never reaſſuming it; for through the frequent Viciſſitudes of his whole Life, he challenged a Reputation among the moſt Eminent States-men, being upon all Emergencies of Affairs conſulted, as one of the beſt Oracles of Government and Policy in his time. It's true he was never ſworn, for ſome Reaſons of State which Courts ſpread a Vail over, but was frequently called to Council. Through his Life he made good his Motto, tam Marti, quam Mercurio: and it is ſtill a Queſtion, Whether he was the better Stateſman or Souldier? incomparably excelling in both the Arts of Peace and War. To riſe by his Studies, probably his Condition and Ambition would not let him judge the ſpeedieſt courſe, much time and a conſiderable fortune being often ſpent in climbing up the tedious ſteps of Preferment that way. He thought it more eaſy to fight, than talk himſelf into a Reputation. Active Times, and a buſy War-like Princeſs, pointed him out the readieſt way to the Temple ple of Honour. The Sword he judged with Alexander the quickeſt Inſtrument to unty all the Knots and tedious Obſtacles of Greatneſs.

Nor could he want Occaſions enow to draw forth his Spirits into Action. France was engaged in a Civil-War; And the Queen, whether out of concern for the Proteſtants, or for reaſon of State, to divert the Giant-Enemy the Spaniard, aſſiſted the poor diſtreſſed Dutch. And the Spaniard by a Policy of the ſame nature, raiſes Rebellions in Ireland, which, like ſubterranean Fires, broke out over all the Kingdom at ſeveral times; when one Mac had in one place ſpent his Force, preſently we hear of the Eruption of another. This Fire was kept in to the end of her Reign, being maintained by that laſting Fewel of Rebellion, and common pretext of change in Government, Religion: The Pope pretending the Kingdom belonged to St. Peter.

Of his firſt publick Appearance Mr. Cambden hath given us this Account: 1569.
The Queen though imbroil'd in a Rebellion at home of the Earl of Northumberland and Dacres in the North, Yet failed not to relieve the Proteſtants in France, who were now brought into a diſtreſſed and almoſt deſperate condition; ſhe exhorted all the Proteſtant Princes to aſſiſt the Common Cauſe, ſupplied the Queen of Navar with Money, taking Jewels in pawn; Permitted Henry Champernoun to carry into France a Troop of Gentlemen-Volunteers, who were reſolved to make good the Motto their Colours bore, Fmem det nobis Virtus. Among theſe Sir Walter engaged himſelf, though (as Mr. Cambden goes on) very young; and now firſt beginning to be of any note. So ſoon the early bloſſoms of his Valour began to appear, which afterwards grew up to an exact ripeneſs and perfection. France was the firſt School, wherein he learnt the Rudiments of War; and the Low-Countries and Ireland (the Military Academies of thoſe times) made him Maſter of that Diſcipline; for in both places he expoſed himſelf afterwards to Land-Service: But their ſlender Pay encouraged him not to ſtay long in either. The Service of Ireland eſpecially ſcarce ſupplying the neceſſities of a Military Life. Being reſtleſs and impatient of a narrow and low condition, and his Services being not ſo ſucceſful as his Hopes were great, and his Merits not anſwered with a Fortune ſtrong enough to buoy up his Reputation, he was reſolved to leave no ſtone unturned, nor any Method of living unexperimented. And ſince his Land-Expeditions could make no Additions to his Fortunes, Novelty and a deſire of putting himſelf into a better capacity, urg'd him to a Sea-Voyage. At both Sea and Land he was the true pattern of Induſtry; and if any Man ever manag'd Neceſſity to its furtheſt improvements, it was He. No expert Souldier or Mariner eſcap'd his Acquaintance and Enquiries; nothing that related to the Arts of War and Navigation miſs'd his peruſal, and one who was Maſter of thoſe parts he enjoyed could with no difficulty make thoſe Arts his own. Add to this the Methods he uſed to improve himſelf. He ſlept but five hours, four he ſpent in reading and maſtering the beſt Authors, two in a ſelect converſation and an inquiſitive diſcourſe, the reſt in buſineſs. He underwent all the labours that attend a Souldier, and fared as the meaneſt. No common Mariner took more pains, or hazarded more in the moſt difficult attempts.

What his Sea-Voyages produced Hiſtories are ſilent in; but not long after his return I find him got again into Ireland, appearing with his own Colours 1580.
flying in the Field, under the command of the Lord Grey, who ſucceeded Pelham in the Deputyſhip of that Kingdom. He had not been long there, before a Quarrel was raiſed between the Lord-Deputy and our Captain, (for with that Title he went into Ireland) which being complain'd of to a Council of War, was referr'd to the Council-Table in England. Our Hiſtorians would make the Lord Grey's Cauſe the faireſt, but Juſtice, and the reſult of the Council, gave Raleigh the Victory. What were the occaſions of this Quarrel our Annals ſlip over, and have only left a large Field for Conjecture to tire it ſelf in. Whether an eager purſuit after Honour, without exact obedience to Military Command, occaſioned by a reſtleſs deſire of doing ſomething great, or whatever elſe it might be, we leave the Reader to fancy. However if his Cauſe had not been good, no Apology, how well ſoever managed, could have brib'd the Judgment of ſo wiſe a Council, wholly ſtrangers to his Worth and Perſon.

About this time Authors place the Æra of his Riſe, but cannot well agree about the occaſion of it. Some would have Leiceſter to be the chief Agent in it, and that he related the whole buſineſs at Council to the Queen with no little advantage to our Captain. Not ſo much probably out of reſpect to Raleigh, as to his own intereſt. For Favourites, like their Princes, ſeldom eſpouſe any Cauſe upon any other ground than what advances or ſtands with their own Deſigns. His own Deſigns indeed on the Queen were blaſted, and finding the burden and envy of a Stateſman too heavy for his aged ſhoulders, he was willing handſomly to impart them to a more active Genius. Though great Favourites ſeldom admit of a Partner, till Age makes them willing to withdraw and leave the trouble of buſineſs to more ſpritely years. They care not to have new Plants ſet, till they themſelves are almoſt withered and ſapleſs.

Others would have his Riſe attributed to Suſſex, who brought him to Court to outſhine Leiceſter, and eclipſe the ſplendor of his Enemy. But what was the ſtrongeſt Argument and only Perſwaſive with the Queen was his Merits, which ſhe ſoon ſaw, and preſently encouraged. Nor muſt I here paſs by one ſmall ſtep to his future Heighth, which our Chronicles have overlook'd, as below the Pen of an Hiſtorian, though ſome have judged an Account of ſome little tranſactions the beſt Inlets to Truth and Myſteries of State. The occaſion was thus: Our Captain coming over out of Ireland upon the afore-mentioned Cauſe to Court, in very good habit (which it ſeems was the greateſt part of his Eſtate) which is often found to be no mean Introducer where Deſerts are not known, found the Queen walking, till ſhe was ſtopt by a plaſhy-place which ſhe ſcrupled treading on, preſently he ſpread his new Pluſh-Coat on the ground, on which the Queen trod gently, being not a little pleas'd as well as ſurpriz'd with ſo unexpected a Complement. Thus, as one remarques upon this Story, An advantagious Admiſſion into the firſt Notices of a Prince is more than half a degree to Preferment. For he preſently after found ſome gracious Beams of Favour reflecting on him, which he was reſolv'd, and well knew how to cheriſh and contract. To put the Queen in remembrance, he wrote in a Window obvious to her Eye, Fuller's Worthies.

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.

Which her Majeſty either eſpying, or being ſhewn, under-wrote this Anſwer,

If thy Heart fail thee, climb not at all.

But his aſpiring Soul could not reſt in the lower, though ſafer way of living; He could not be mean, whoſe Reſolutions were ſo great, and whoſe Prudence and Activity made him capable of the higheſt Preferments. Inſpir'd with a reſtleſs and ambitious Genius he deſign'd nothing but what was extream, and had rather not be, than not be one of the moſt Eminent. And to the greateſt Height probably he had arrived, had he lived in any other Princes Reigns than that of Q. Elizabeth and K. James, the former being not over-haſty to raiſe any to any great Honour, and the latter not caring for Men of War and Blood.

Raleigh was ſo towardly an Apprentice in the Court-Trade, that he ſoon ſet up for himſelf, and would have improv'd this ſtock of Favour to a great advantage, had he not loſt by thoſe common Enemies to it, Envy and Jealouſie. In a ſhort time he is become a Minion, obtains the Queens Ear, is often conſulted, and nothing done without him. Her Favour and his Parts began to allarm his Rivals, who like ſome envious Neighbours will not eaſily permit any Fabrick to ſtand long that hinders their own Proſpect. Jealous Favourites, like wiſe Planters, will not ſuffer the Under-Wood to riſe, which may obſtruct the growth of taller Trees.

Leiceſter began to repent his choice of his Creature, and thought he grew too faſt in his Miſtreſſes Favour. To ſtop the current of her Affection, he privately endeavours to undermine his Eſteem, and introduce a new Favourite that might be his Rival. To bring about this deſign, Leiceſter thought there would be nothing wanting, if by Raleigh's abſence he could have opportunity to introduce the Earl of Eſſex; nor did he long expect before one offer'd it ſelf: for the Queen being willing to encourage Raleigh, (who, as Mr. Cambden is pleaſed to tell us, was never ſufficiently to be commended for the great pains he took to diſcover remote Countries, and to advance the Glory of the Engliſh Navigation and Trade) ſent him on a Voyage to Sea. Nor did he make a vain and fruitleſs one; for at his Return he brought news of a new Country, diſcover'd by him in the Year 1584, called in honour of the Queen Virginia, before call'd Wingandacoa by the barbarous Inhabitants. A Country that hath been ſince of no inconſiderable Profit to our Nation. But though Patents were granted to him to ſettle a Plantation there, it grew not famous till the Reign of King James: Wherein this Nation quickly found out the Excellency and Fruitfulneſs of the place, ſo agreeable to our Engliſh Bodies, and profitable to the Exchequer. Nature there is prodigal, and makes amends for her parſimony to other parts of the World. An Acre there yielding often forty Buſhels of Corn; and, which is more ſtrange, there being three Harveſts in a Year: For their Corn is ſow'd, ripe, and cut down in little more than two Months.

For this, and other beneficial Expeditions and Deſigns, this Year her Ma- 1584.
jeſty was pleaſed to confer on him the honour of Knighthood, which in her Reign was more eſteemed than in her Succeſſors. The Queen keeping the Temple of Honour cloſe ſhut, and never open'd but to Vertue and Deſert. Nor was ſhe indeed ever haſty to reward; for ſhe ſeldom paid in any other coin than Patents and good Words. So that the greateſt number of thoſe who might pretend to Favour, were the Architects of their own Fortunes, and had little or no Encouragement from her, more than that of a Spectator, who praiſes the Workmanſhip, and commends the handſom Contrivances of a Building, but is at no part of the Expences of raiſing it. Hence our Sir Walter's Rewards are quickly enumerated, for he got nothing after all his Exploits and Deſigns, but the Wardenſhip of the Stanneries, Command of the Guard, and the Government of Jerſey and Virginia; Places of no very great Profit, nor anſwerable to his Worth, or juſt Ambition.

1588. In 1588, the Grand Climacterick of Spain, (for Bodies Politick have their Critical Times) I find Sir Walter by his Example encouraging others of the Gentry to ſet out Ships at their proper charges, and by his admirable Conduct and Courage to put them to the beſt uſe. Which hired Ships were Actors of no ſmall uſe in that fatal Blow given to the Invincible Armada. Three Years this Giant had been growing to that portentous Greatneſs, with infinite Expences and Induſtry; but was beaten, ruin'd, and diſhonourably overthrown in leſs than a Months ſpace: the Spaniards finding that our Ships as well as the Heavens could fight againſt them.

But this Shock, like ſome Ague-fit, was eaſily recovered, and in a ſhort time after the Spaniards began to renew their former Deſigns. For in the 1592. Parliament which began Feb. 19. 1592, I find Sir Walter Raleigh informing the Houſe, that the Queen could not without Subſidies prevent the eminent Dangers threatned from the Spaniard. Of which Subſidies he ſpake (as he proteſted) not only to pleaſe the Queen, to whom he was infinitely obliged, but for the neceſſity he both ſaw and knew; He told them, he very well diſcovered the great ſtrength of the King of Spain; and to ſhew his Mightineſs, he informed the Houſe how he poſſeſt all the World. And that his Malice and ill purpoſes againſt this Realm might be evident, he ſhew'd how on every ſide he had beleaguer'd us; In Denmark, the King being young, he had corrupted the Council and Nobility; ſo it was very likely he would ſpeed himſelf of Ships from thence. In the Maritime Towns of the Low-Countries, and in Norway he hath laid in great ſtore of Shipping. In France he hath the Parliament-Towns at command; In Britanny he hath all the beſt Havens; and in Scotland he hath corrupted the Nobility, and promis'd them Forces to aſſiſt the Papiſts, and that they were ready to joyn with any Foreign Aids, that would make them ſtrong enough to be by themſelves, and to reſiſt others; for, as he thought, there were not ſix Gentlemen of that Country of one Religion. In his own Country there are all poſſible Preparations making, and he is coming with ſixty Galleys, beſides other Shipping. If our Subſidies are not ſudden, he may with eaſe invade us riding at Anchor; but all will be little enough to withſtand him. At his coming he fully reſolveth to get Plymouth, or at leaſt to poſſeſs ſome of the Havens this Summer within our Land. And Plymouth is in moſt danger; for no Ordnance can be carried thither to remove him, the paſſages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him, is to ſend a Royal Army and ſupplant him in Britanny, and to poſſeſs our ſelves there; and to ſend a ſtrong Navy to Sea, and to lye with it on the Cape, and at Lambuck, to which places come all his Ships with Riches from all places, and there they may ſet upon all that come.

What ſucceſs this Speech alone had I know not, but the Subſidy was granted, with the general conſent of the Houſe, to carry on a War againſt Spain. His Expedition a little after demonſtrates that the Queen took his Advice, which was to afflict the Spaniards at a diſtance; and whilſt ſhe could not handſomly aſſault his more neighbourly and guarded parts, to diſturb thoſe that were more naked and further off, his Indies. The Moneys brought from thence being the Nerves and Sinews of his Power, and the chiefeſt Incendiary in the Iriſh Rebellion, which if handſomly ſtopt, would put an end to his Greatneſs, and humble the mighty Monarch.

That he might not want an opportunity to ſhew his Valour and Conduct in this Affair, the Queen ſends him to Sea to manifeſt both; thinking none more fit to be imployed in a Buſineſs, than the Perſon that counſelled and ſtarted it. Having the Courage of a Souldier to put in execution the ſober Advices of the Gown-man. To America he is ſent with fifteen Men of War to poſſeſs himſelf of Panama, where the Spaniards ſhip their Riches, or to intercept their paſſage homewards. But he found more Encouragement from the willingneſs of the Seamen than from the Winds, which held the Ships in their Havens for three months; a Circumſtance, which put an ill look upon the Enterprize, and had almoſt made it vain. But nothing could allay the Courage of the Seamen, who were buoy'd up with the hopes of Prey, and the ſucceſs of their Commander. Having ſet ſail at laſt, they got beyond the Spaniſh Cape, called the Lands-end, where they met with unwelcom Intelligence, viz. That by expreſs Command from his Catholick Majeſty no Ship was to ſtir from the Weſt-Indies that Year. Together with this News, inſtead of meeting with the long'd-for Enemy, they were attaqu'd with a more invincible one, a furious Tempeſt, which diſperſt and diſordered the Fleet, and ſunk their Ship-Boats. Thus being on all ſides aſſaulted with Tempeſts, Diſaſters, and the worſe news of the Spaniards ſtay in the other World, he thought the Heavens had daſh'd his Deſigns, and rendred a well-ordered Contrivance abortive. Upon which at firſt he intended to make for home with the whole Fleet; but another Project offered it ſelf after ſecond thoughts, of dividing the Navy into two Squadrons, from the hope that though while together they had been ſucceſsleſs, yet Fortune might offer to them when ſeparated ſomething worthy their patience and deſires. Immediately one Squadron is committed to the conduct of Sir John Burroughs, Son to the Lord Burroughs; the other to Sir Martin Forbiſher, with their reſpective Commiſſions. Sir Martin's charge was to lie off and on the Coaſt of Spain, to hinder the coming in of their Veſſels. Sir John's to wait at the Azores for the coming of the Caracks out of the Eaſt-Indies.

Sir Walter was much blam'd for this Action, and thought ſhort in his Politicks in giving over the hopeful part of the Deſign to Sir John Burroughs, and retiring himſelf to Court. But the Succeſs was the only Argument of his Overſight, and nothing but the Event could charge him with Imprudence. The Diviſion of the Fleet proved a wiſe Deſign, and amazed the Spaniard. For while the Spaniſh Admiral eyed Forbiſher, the mighty Caracks were unregarded, and left to the mercy of Burroughs's Men of War as an eaſy prey. Who having according to Order arrived at Sancta Cruce, a ſmall Town in the Iſle of Azores, a little after got ſight of a Portugal Merchant-man, (briskly purſued by a Privateer of the Earl of Cumberland's) but could not reach her, an unhappy Calm keeping him at a too far diſtance. But a more welcom Storm ariſing in the night, forc'd both to weigh Anchor. Aſſoon as day appeared, the Portuguees was unlading as faſt as ſhe could at Flores, and upon the approach of the Engliſh fired their Carack: But though their Deſigns were ruin'd on that Ship, yet the news they got from ſome Priſoners taken, gave them freſh hopes, and heartned them with the Information, that ſeveral other Merchant-men were behind coming for Spain. This put Sir John Burroughs upon placing his Men of War at ſeveral diſtances, to reach as far about as was poſſible. But they had not long waited, before their diligence was rewarded with the ſurprizal of a large Veſſel, called the Mother of God, which was 165 foot long from Head to Stern, and ſeven Decks high, laden with Goods to the value of 150000 l. Engliſh, beſides what the Seamen privately ſeized for their own uſe.

Sir Walter having now deſerted his Naval Employ, and become again a Courtier, it was not long before he was ſeized with the idle Court-Diſeaſe of 1595. Love, the unfortunate occaſion of the worſt Action of his whole Life. For in the Year 1695, I find him under a Cloud, baniſh'd the Court, and his Miſtreſſes Favour withdrawn, for devirginating a Maid of Honour. But why for this one Action he ſhould lie under the imputation of an Atheiſt, and from a ſingle crime get the denomination of a Debauch, is the Logick of none but the Vulgar. By the ſame reaſon the other Favourites of thoſe Times (Leiceſter, Cecil, and Eſſex) bid as fair for thoſe titles, the latter making the Parallel good in this Vice, with his Succeſſor Buckingham, though in other circumſtances there was a great diſparity. Neither ever was it a Crime of any magnitude in the Orb of Courts. But to ſtop the Mouth of Fame, which is always open on ſuch occaſions, and to wipe out the Infamy of the Fact, he was ſhortly after married to the Object of his Love, the deflowred Lady. And to get Reputation among the People, who always were unjuſt to him in their Sentiments, he put himſelf on a Voyage to Guiana, for the Improvement and Honour of his Country. Having therefore obtained his Liberty (for, for this Action he was impriſoned ſome months) and finding all things with an unpleaſant Aſpect, he followed his Genius of diſcovering new Places, and tracing Nature in her more retired and hidden Paths; thinking that Abſence, and a fortunate Voyage, might reinveſt him in his Miſtreſſes thoughts, and merit a new Eſteem.

Guiana had been talk'd of much by the Spaniards as an excellent Country, and for one Commodity the Spaniards had a great reverence for, very famous, Gold, which put Sir Walter upon the Attempt, judging it beſides a place (if maſtered) very convenient for its ſituation to annoy and diſturb the Spaniards American Traffick, and would be no little help in building his Fortunes, and what was more eſtimable, Place him in his Miſtreſſes Favour again.

From Plymouth he ſet ſail on the ſixth of February, and on the 22d of March arrived at the Iſle of Trinidado, eight degrees on this ſide the Equinoctial-Line; where he ſoon made himſelf Maſter of St. Joſephs, a ſmall City; and, which was more conſiderable, of the Governour Antonio Bereo, from whom he got the beſt Account of thoſe Parts, and its Trade. Leaving his Ship at Trinidado, with ſome Pinaces and an hundred Men, and the ſmall ſtock of Knowledg he obtained of Bereo, he made up the great River Ormus, in ſearch of Guiana. What he found, ſaw, and performed there, his moſt ingenious Hiſtory of thoſe Parts, may ſatisfy the Curious.

In his Return he fired Cumana, becauſe the Inhabitants would not redeem it with Money; beſides ſeveral Cottages at St. Maries, and Rio de la Hach. Neither did he deſiſt in this Deſign of Guiana, for once or twice Mr. Cambden tells us afterwards he proſecuted it with vaſt Expences, although the Spaniards had placed a Colony at Trinidado to hinder his further Attempts.

Whilſt Sir Walter is ſearching for a new World, Hawkins and Drake are attempting freſh things in thoſe parts of America which the Spaniards were already poſſeſt of. But their old Fortune had left them, and the unhappineſs of the Action put an end to their Lives; In the Year 1596, both died with Grief, and bequeath'd their Hatred of the Spaniard to Sir Walter, to revenge their Quarrel.

1596. Who this Year return'd, being ſatisfied with his Expedition, and much more with the Reception he found at Court. The Storm was blown over, and his Miſtreſſes Brow was more ſmooth than at his departure; after his Eclipſe he ſhone brighter at Court, and the Death of thoſe two famous Seamen, put them upon courting Sir Walter, whom the neceſſity of State forced them to cheriſh and encourage. It's ſtrange, that what was Eſſex's Ruine ſhould confirm Sir Walter in favour, frequent abſence from his Miſtreſs. But Sir Walter's Obſequiouſneſs work'd much upon the humour of the Queen, who lov'd Pliantneſs and exact Obedience, which Eſſex could not always counterfeit.

Eclipſe

The Spaniard being encouraged with the poſſeſſion of Cales, from whence it was but a ſhort cut over into England, the Death of Hawkins, and their former ſcourge, Drake, and the earneſt Solicitations of the Iriſh (who through her Reign had got the Itch of Rebellion, which was fed and maintained by the Spaniard, though they had been ſufficiently blooded by the Engliſh;) And the Queen foreſeeing a Storm gathering, thought the beſt way was to ſcatter it before it grew too great, and came too near. She reſolved therefore to begin with the Spaniard firſt, and fairly ſet on the Enemy in his own Ports. She ſpeedily riggs a brave Fleet, conſiſting of 150 Ships, mann'd by 6360 Souldiers, 1000 Volunteer-Gentlemen, 6772 Seamen. Robert Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord Howard were Commanders of equal Authority, having been both at an exceſſive charge in carrying on the War. To theſe were joyned a Council of War, conſiſting of ſeveral eminent Seamen and Souldiers, among whom was our Sir Walter. The Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the firſt commanded by the Admiral Lord Howard; the ſecond by Eſſex; the third by Sir Thomas Howard; the fourth by Sir Walter Raleigh.

In the beginning of June they ſet ſail, and got to Gades the 20th: their deſign being perfectly unknown, as well to their Enemies as their own Men. Eſſex heated with Youth, and an ambition of doing bravely, would have preſently landed and aſſaulted the Enemy: but this heat was allayed and corrected by Sir Walter's Advice, who impugned all ſuch raſh Attempts. At laſt a fit Opportunity preſented it ſelf, and by all it was reſolved to fight them. At which news the Earl threw up his Hat for joy. The Ebbing-Waters would not permit the great Ships to engage, the Shelves being of greater hazard than the Enemy. Therefore Raleigh is pitch'd on as the moſt proper Perſon in the midſt of the Chanel to provoke them, who accordingly in a little Ship called the Waſtſpight, directed his Prow againſt the Spaniſh Men of War, which thereupon preſently fell back. Upon this the reſt of the Fleet came in, and burnt and took ſeveral of their Ships. After this Victory at Sea, the Men were very importunate to go aſhore, whom Eſſex Landed at Puntal, a League from the City. At firſt the Spaniards received them with a great deal of courage, but the Engliſh charged ſo warmly, that they thought it their prudentſt way to retire with more ſpeed than they came out. The Engliſh purſued ſo cloſe, that they had almoſt recovered the City-Gates as ſoon as they. The Earl got upon a Bulwark near the Gate, and from thence he eſpyed an Entrance into the Town, but very hazardous, it being down a very ſteep Precipice: but this did not affright ſeveral of our Engliſh, who leaped from thence into the Town, and engaged the Enemy in the Streets. In the mean time Sir Walter and others having forced the Gates, entred the Town, and the Caſtle was ſurrendred on Merciful Conditions. But Sir Walter was not idle, or eager after the enjoyment of his Conqueſt; for whilſt others were reaping the plentiful Harveſt of War, he with ſome ſmall ſhips who could paſs up the Chanel, fired their Merchant-men which were withdrawn to Port-Real, although they offered two millions of Ducats for their Redemption. Great vvere the Losses to the Spaniards by this War; and if we may believe our Histories, amounted to no less than Twenty Millions of Ducats. Upon Consultation it vvas resolv'd to quit the Town, though contrary to the Opinion of Essex, vvho was for keeping it, as a future Annoyance to the Spaniards. After this they took Faro in Algarbe, and being weary at last of their Victories, they resolved for Home, though much against Essex's vvill, vvhose youthful heat vvas but inflam'd by their Successes, but vvas vvisely slak'd by the prudence of the Admiral, and the sober advice of Sir Walter: vvho finding their Men sick, and having gotten so ample Rewards, vvere not again for hazarding their Fortune upon hopes of a future Prey.

At their Return the Queen vvelcom'd and encourag'd her Souldiers with new Honours. All but Essex vvere pleased, vvho found State-Preferments not dispos'd of according to his mind. Vere vvas made Governour of the Briel, and Sir Robert Cecil Secretary of State.

To recover their Losses at Gades, the Spaniard riggs out a new Fleet, vvhich vvere baffled alone by the Winds; for the greatest part vvere cast avvay and wreck'd. With the Reliques of this Fleet, in the Year following I find him upon his old Designs of Ireland: But the Queen vvas always too nimble for the Grave Don, vvhose Designs, like his Ships, mov'd slow and heavy.

1597. Twenty Ships were rigg'd out at present, and afterwards encreased to an hundred and twenty Men of War and Victuallers; five thousand Men rais'd, besides a thousand old Souldiers vvho came from the Netherlands with Vere. To appease Essex, the vvhole Conduct of the Expedition is committed to him. The Navy vvas divided into three Squadrons; The first led by Essex himself; The second by Howard; The third by Sir Walter, vvho now vvas esteemed the ablest Seaman of his Age. To enoble this Expedition, several Persons of quality of all sorts engaged themselves, vvho look'd rather like Courtiers than Souldiers, being more adorn'd with Feathers and gay Cloaths, than arm'd vvith Courage and Resolution. On the ninth of July they set out vvith these Instructions, viz. To steer to Farol and the Groine, to surprize the Spaniards in their Harbours, and to intercept their Indian Fleet (the Bait of the War) at the Azores. Which Design vvas built upon very good Maximes of State; for it vvould hinder the Fleet intended against England; Their Merchant-men vvanting Convoys, might be seized on; The Azores won, (vvhere the Indian Fleet always call'd for fresh Water in their Return;) the Queen have the Dominion of the Seas; and the Spaniard be obliged to a Treatment of Peace. Essex gave out that he vvas resolved to sacrifice Himself and the Navy for his Country: But his brisk Resolutions vvere quickly daunted by a dismal Tempest, vvhich astonish'd the Mariners themselves, and forc'd home our gawdy Voluntiers, vvho thought no Enemy so terrible as a Tempest, and the severe motions of a Sea-sick stomack. Thus by this Contradiction of Heaven their Ships vvere torn, their Victuals spent, and they upon this Emergency forc'd to a Consultation what to do. Some were for laying aside the Farol and the Groine Attempts; others for a Voyage to the Azores, vvhich was contradicted by Vere. So that at last Essex and Raleigh were pitch'd on to ride Post for Advice to the Queen. Essex talk'd to the Queen of strange Chimæras; how that if he vvere permitted to have the Fleet, he would vvith ease fire the Spanish Navy, and perform many other bold Designs; about which the Queen caution'd him, and desir'd the whole Business should be managed as their joynt-discretion should prompt, and opportunity offer it self. But if it were possible, if any occasion courted them them to it, they ſhould fire the Ships in Farol Haven, and intercept what other Ships they could from the Indies; And upon all occaſions manifeſt their Conduct and Valour. With theſe Inſtructions they ſet ſail again from Plymouth, (whither they were returned the 17th of Auguſt) but were ſeparated by a Tempeſt near the Promontory Nerium, or the Lands-end. A croſs Yard in Raleigh's Ship was broken by the Impetus of the Storm, and fell, which forc'd him to ſtay behind to make it good; And having been falſely inform'd that the Spaniſh Fleet was bound for the Azores, after having repaired his Ship, he ſteer'd his courſe thitherwards. In the mean time Eſſex's Jealouſy, and the pernicious Inſinuations of Raleigh's Enemies, had wrought him into a belief that this Diviſion of the Navy was on purpoſe laid and fore-deſign'd by Raleigh: But however the buſineſs was put up at his Arrival, and Eſſex welcomed him, making an Apology for acquainting the Queen with the Diviſion falſly repreſented, and built (as it appear'd) on wrong ſuppoſitions.

Here wanting Water, Sir Walter landed without leave, and ſcarce had taken in Water before he received Orders immediately to follow Eſſex to Fayal, whither he repair'd; but not finding Eſſex there according to his Order, he ſpent his time in taking an exact ſurvey of the Haven, and of the People there, who from the fear and apprehenſion of what followed, were haſtily packing away their Goods. This fair Opportunity, upon Conſultation, puts him upon taking the Town, and egg'd on the Souldiers in hopes of an ample Prey. Sir Gilly Merrick (one of Eſſex his Creatures) diſſwaded Sir Walter from the Deſign, alledging it would rob the Earl of the Honour of taking it, and ſo confirm him his Enemy. But Sir Walter's deſire of Glory, and the Souldiers Avarice, urg'd him (after he had ſtaid ſome time for Eſſex's Arrival) to the Aſſault of the Place, which was at laſt taken. The next day after this Exploit Eſſex arrived at Fayal, where he was quickly inform'd of what Raleigh had done, and that the whole Buſineſs was tranſacted with no other deſign than to rob him of the Glory, which his Jealouſy made him eaſily believe.

Some perſwaded the Earl to try Sir Walter before a Council of War, and caſhier him; others without more ado would have him put to death, for landing without Orders: At laſt ſome of Raleigh's Officers were caſhier'd, He himſelf frown'd on, and ſeverely reprov'd by Eſſex. But he never wanted an Apology for his Ambition; inſtancing that he was not obliged to the Orders the inferiour Officers and Souldiers were; that the Commiſſion did not reach Him, being one of the three Generals; Moreover, that he ſtaid for him four days; that he was neceſſitated at laſt to land, being in extream want of Water, which was not to be had without fighting. However, the Lord Howard became his Mediator, and perſwaded him to an honourable ſubmiſſion; which was perform'd, and accepted of; and thereupon both himſelf, and the caſhier'd Captains and Souldiers were again admitted into favour. But this was only laying their Paſſions aſleep awhile, which in the ſequel of our ſtory were again awaken'd. I cannot here omit a ſpeech of the Earls upon this occaſion, (which Sir Henry Wotton calls a Noble Word) who being urged to put Sir Walter on Martial Law: That I would do, ſaid he, if he were my Friend.

However this Expedition was not ſo glorious and great as at firſt they hoped it might have been. For after burning the Town, and taking Flores, Gratioſa, and Villa Franca in St. Michaels, with three American Spaniſh Ships, together with the burning of a Carack, they came home much torn, leaky, and weather-beaten, about the end of October. This Expedition was commented on variouſly by the People, who were ſtrangely carried on with a blind paſſion for Eſſex, and ſo very prone to miſconſtrue Raleigh's Actions, from a Prejudice they had entertain'd, that becauſe he was not Eſſex's friend, he muſt be an enemy to his Country. However, the Queen look'd on him with another eye, and he grew faſter in her favour than his Rival, who from this time began rather to decline, by a Fault Sir Walter was afterwards guilty of, Inſatiable Ambition; a Principle that put him on thoſe Practices which brought him afterwards to the Block. Eſſex was incens'd that Sir Robert Cecil, Raleigh s Friend, was preferr'd in his abſence. And becauſe the Earl's Concerns are woven amongſt Sir Walter's, it will not be impertinent to give ſome Account of him here.

Eſſex was arrived at the heighth of Favour, and might have ſtaid there, had he taken his Meaſures aright, had he own'd an Obſequiouſneſs to the Queen, or been Maſter of the great Requiſite in a Courtier, Diſſimulation; but it was a part of his Character, to be a great Reſenter, and a weak Diſſembler of the leaſt Diſgrace. His Ireland Tranſactions were ill conſtrued, and his Miſcarriages nicely diſſected by the curious eyes of thoſe State-Anatomiſts, the Lord-Treaſurer Buckhurſt, the Lord-Admiral Nottingham, and his mortal Enemy Secretary Cecil, who began to remove him out of that Favour he had ſo long poſſeſt. But it was true, as the Earl of Clarendon has obſerv'd, "That though he was Rival'd by a ſtrong and ſubtile Faction, "which cared, conſulted for his Ruine; yet the Danger was thus allayed, "that they were all his publick and profeſſed Enemies, and ſo known to "the Queen, that they durſt never impertinently urge ought againſt him, "ſince they were ſure that Malice was concluded, when the Reaſon of their "Objection haply might not be conſidered.

However, in 1601 the Earl drew near his Ruine: for being hurried on by Cuffs ill Counſel, and his own Diſcontents, he projects new Plots againſt the State, and tampers with the King of Scots to remove his Enemies at Court by force, informing him that the Power of the Nation lay in their hands, Raleigh being Governour of Jerſey, &c. and other of his Enemies having the ſtrength of the Nation at their command. And vainly preſuming upon the love of the Citizens, he projects to ſeize the Court, and to ſecure Raleigh, as the moſt conſiderable Enemy he had. Of which Deſign Gorges informs Sir Walter. The better to carry on his Deſigns, Eſſex goes into London, where he endeavoured to excite the Citizens to an Inſurrection: But the City then being Rich, were not ſo apt to rebel; Rebellion being uſually the Daughter of Poverty and Diſcontent. For theſe Treaſonable Actions, being found guilty, he was condemned and executed.

That he died bravely and like a Gentleman, is not to be queſtioned; but that Sir Walter Raleigh ſhould come openly to ſee him die, on purpoſe only to fat his Eyes with the Sacrifice of his Enemy, can never be granted, if we may believe himſelf in the ſame circumſtances on the Scaffold, where he told his Auditors on the words of a Dying-man, he only came there to defend himſelf if any thing had been urged againſt him by the Earl.

Thus ended that Favourite, whoſe Death ſtruck a damp on the Queens proſperous days, and gave blackneſs to her declining Reign. This Blow, like that of Gunpowder, not only blew up his Friends and Neighbours, but ſhook his Enemies at a diſtance; for it reached Sir Walter too, who wanting ſtrength to grapple with his Rival the Treaſurer, and not owning humility enough enough to be his Servant, periſhed at laſt in the Encounter. This himſelf preſag'd (if we may believe Osborn) as he came from the Execution of Eſſex in a Boat, when he was heard to ſay, That it was more ſafe to have many enemies at Court of equal power, than one falſe and ambitious friend who hath attain'd to the abſoluteneſs of Command.

The Queen could not long ſurvive her Favourite; for I find her Death to be the next Year following. A Queen who had enriched the Nation, reform'd Religion, curb'd the Pride of Spain, ſupported France, preſerv'd Scotland, protected the Hollander againſt the Spaniard, and had vanquiſhed his Armies by Sea and Land, reduced Ireland to obedience notwithſtanding all the ſubtil practices of Spain, and open Aſſiſtance given in Arms to her Iriſh Rebels, with many other things which might ſeem too much to be the Atchievements of one Reign.

King James her Succeſſor came to the poſſeſſion of a Kingdom arrived at the heighth of Proſperity, which like all other Bodies when they are at their Ακμὴ tend to Corruption, and degenerate. This Sir Walter perceiv'd, and would have, as he thought, remedied. Sir John Forteſcue, the Lord Cobham, Sir VValter, and others, would have obliged the King by Articles before his coming to the Crown, that his Country-mens number ſhould be limited: But this was ſtopped by the prudent Treaſurer, and the bold Northumberland. Sir VValter fear'd that the Scots, like Locuſts, would quickly devour this Kingdom; it being probable that, like the Goths and Vandals, they would ſettle in any Country rather than their own, and would make it their buſineſs to render our Nation as beggarly as theirs: for this, He, with the reſt of them, was afterwards frown'd on by the King, and loſt his Command of the Guards. 1602.

However, Sir VValter ſtill purſued the Good and Glory of his Country; and as formerly in Active Times, gave his Advice ſtill againſt the Peace with Spain, which might now with no great difficulty be brought on its knees. At the entrance of the King he preſented him with a Manuſcript of his own writing, with no weak Arguments againſt the Peace. But Sir VValter was miſtaken, for his Counſel was ill-timed, and a new Part was now to be acted, the Scene being changed. Peace was the King's Aim, whether out of Fear, or Religious Principles I determine not. But with Spain a Peace is concluded, with an Enemy already humbled, who now had time given them to recover their former Loſſes, and were as it were cheriſh'd to aſſault us with the greater vigor; which how true it proved every man can tell. And as if the King would quite run counter to the Queens Politiques, the Eſtates of the Netherlands are deſpiſed, ſlighted, and deſerted, under pretence that it were of ill example for a Monarch to protect them.

The King is hardly warm in his Throne, but there is a great noiſe of a Plot, generally call'd Sir VValter Raleighs Treaſon, but upon what grounds I know not, ſince he had the leaſt hand in it, as by his Tryal will appear. A Plot that is ſtill a Myſtery, and hath a Vail ſpread over it; A Plot compos'd of ſuch a Hodg-podge of Religion and Intereſts, that the World ſtands amazed Sir VValter Raleigh ſhould ever be drawn into it; A Plot ſo unlikely to hurt others, or benefit themſelves, that as Osborn tells us, "If ever Folly was capable of the title, or Pity due to Innocence, theirs might claim ſo large a "ſhare, as not poſſible to be too ſeverely condemn'd, or ſlightly enough puniſhed. Envy and Diſdain, as Sir Walter has told us in his Remains, ſeek Innovation by Faction. Diſcontent is the great Seducer, which at firſt put him to ſearch into a Plot, he afterwards was betray'd into. The chief Ingredients in this Medley were two Prieſts Watſon and Clark, and Count Arembergh, Ambaſſador Extraordinary for the Arch-Duke, who brought in Cobham, and he his Brother George Brook, both Proteſtants, at leaſt ſeeming ſo; George Brook hook'd in Parham and others, and they the Lord Grey of Wilton, a rank Puritan. Then came in Sir Walter, the wiſeſt of them all, according to Sanderſon, who, as he tells us, dallied like a Fly in the Flame, till it conſum'd him. Willing he was to know it, and thought by his Wit to over-reach the Confederates, whom he knew well enough, though he dealt with none but Cobham, as I can find out. One Mr. Lawrency an Antwerp-Merchant, was the property made uſe of by Arembergh, and a Crony of the Lord Cobhams. Theſe carried on the Contrivance a long while, which (as Sanderſon tells us) was betray'd by Lawrency, and the vigilancy of Cecil. And indeed it was morally impoſſible that ſo many diſagreeing weak Souls ſhould carry on a Project without taking Air; The leaſt glimpſe being enough to give light to the Stateſmen of thoſe times. Their Deſigns were,

1. To ſet the Crown on the Lady Arabella; or to ſeize on the King, and make him grant their Deſires, and a Pardon.
2. To have a Toleration of Religion.
3. To procure Aid and Aſſiſtance from Foreign Princes.
4. To turn out of the Court ſuch as they diſlik'd, and place themſelves in Offices.

Watſon to be Lord-Chancellor.
George Brook Lord-Treaſurer.
Sir Griffin Markham Secretary of State.
Lord Grey Maſter of the Horſe, and Earl-Marſhal of England. But it ſeems they made no proviſion for Sir Walter; which is no inconſiderable Argument of his Innocency, who would have deſerved, and might have expected as great a Reward as any of them, had he been engaged in the Plot.

To oblige to Secrecy, Watſon draws up an Oath. But all is betray'd; they are ſeiz'd, examined, and tryed. How well or ill Sir Walter has acquitted himſelf, we ſhall leave to the Opinion of the Readers of the following TRYAL, which was exactly and faithfully taken.

THE

THE ARRAIGNMENT OF Sir Walter Raleigh, Kt.

Temp. Jac. 1603.

AT Winton, Thurſday the 17*th* of November, Anno. Dom. 1603. before the Right Honourable the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain.

Lord Wotton.
Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain.
Lord Chief Juſtice of England, Popham.
Juſtice Gaudie.
Juſtice Warburton, and others, Commiſſioners by ſpecial Delegate Aſſigned.

Firſt, The Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, was read by the Clerk of the Crown Office.

And then preſently the Indictment was in effect as followeth:

THat he did Conſpire, and go about to Deprive the King of his Government, to raiſe up Sedition within the Realm, to alter Religion, to bring in the Roman Superſtition, and to procure Forraign Enemies to Invade the Kingdoms. That the Lord Cobham, the 9th of June, did meet with the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh in Durham Houſe, in the Pariſh of St. Martins in the Fields, and then and there had Conference with him how to Advance Arabella Stuart to the Crown, and Royal Throne of this Kingdom; and that then and there it was agreed, that Cobham ſhould Treat with Aremberg, Embaſſador from to the Arch Duke of Auſtrea, to obtain of him 600000 Crowns, to bring to paſs their intended Treaſons. It was agreed, that Cobham ſhould go to Albert the Arch-Duke, to procure him to advance the pretended Title of Arabella: From thence knowing that Albert had not ſufficient Means to maintain his own Army in the Low Countries, Cobham ſhould go to Spain to procure the King to aſſiſt, and further her pretended Title.

It was agreed, the better to Effect all this Conſpiracy, that Arabella ſhould write three Letters, one to the Arch-Duke, another to the King of Spain, and a third to the Duke of Savoy, and promiſe three things: Firſt, to Eſtabliſh firm Peace between England and Spain. Secondly, To Tolerate the Popiſh and Roman Superſtition. Thirdly, To be Ruled by them in Contracting of her Marriage.

And for the effecting theſe Traiterous Purpoſes, Cobham ſhould return by the Iſle of Jerſey, and ſhould find Sir Walter Raleigh Captain of the ſaid Iſle there, and take Councel of Raleigh, for the Diſtributing of the aforeſaid Crowns, as the Occaſion and Diſcontentment of the Subjects ſhould give Cauſe and Way.

And further, That Cobham and his Brother Brook, met on the 9th of June, and Cobham told Brook all theſe Treaſons: To the which Treaſons, Brook gave his Aſſent, and did joyn himſelf to all theſe; and after on the Thurſday following, Cobham and Brook did ſpeak theſe words: That there would never be a good World in England, till the King (meaning our Soveraign Lord) and his Cubs (meaning his Royal Iſſue) were taken away.

And the more to Diſable and Deprive the King of his Crown, and to Confirm the ſaid Cobham in his Intents, Raleigh did Publiſh a Book, falſly Written againſt the moſt Juſt and Royal Title of the King, knowing the ſaid Book to be Written againſt the juſt Title of the King; which Book Cobham after that received of him. Further, for the better Effecting theſe Trayterous Purpoſes, and to Eſtabliſh the ſaid Brook in his Intent, the ſaid Cobham did deliver the ſaid Book unto him, the 14th of June. And further, the ſaid Cobham, on the 16th of June, for accompliſhment of the ſaid Conference; And by the Trayterous Inſtigation of Raleigh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed Princes, to procure them to Advance her Title; and that ſhe, after ſhe had obtained the Crown, ſhould promiſe to perform three things, viz. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To Tolerate with Impunity, the Popiſh and Roman Superſtitions. 3. To be Ruled by them three, in the Contracting of her Marriage.

To theſe Motions, the ſaid Brook gave his aſſent, and for the better Effecting of the ſaid Treaſons, Cobham on the 17th of June, by the Inſtigation of Raleigh, did write Letters to Count Aremberg, and did deliver the ſaid Letters to one Matthew de Lawrency, to be delivered to the ſaid Count: Which he did deliver for the obtaining of 600000 Crowns, which Money by other Letters, Count Aremberg did promiſe to perform the Payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the 18th of June. And then did Cobham promiſe to Raleigh, that when he had received the ſaid Money, he would deliver 8000 Crowns to him, to which Motion he did conſent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he ſhould receive the ſaid Crowns, he would give to him 10000 thereof; to which Motion Brook did aſſent.

To the Indictment, Sir Walter Raleigh pleaded not Guilty.

The JURY.

Thomas Highgate, Gent.
Robert Kempthon, Gent.
Edward Littlebury, Gent.
John Chawkey, Gent.
Robert Brumley, Gent.

Sir Walter Raleigh Priſoner, was asked, whether he would take Exceptions to any of the Jury.

Raleigh. I know none of them; they are all Chriſtians and Honeſt Gentlemen, I except againſt none.

E. Suff. You Gentlemen of the Kings Learned Jury, follow the ſame Courſe as you did the other day.

Raleigh. I pray you, I may anſwer the Points particularly as they are delivered, by reaſon of the Weakneſs of my Memory and Sickneſs.

Popham, Chief Juſtice. After the Kings Learned Council have delivered all the Evidence, you may Anſwer particularly.

Heath, the Kings Sergeant at Law. You have heard of Raleigh's bloody attempts, to Kill the King and his Noble Progeny, and in place thereof, to advance one Arabella Stuart: The particulars of the Indictment are theſe. Firſt, That Raleigh met with Cobham the 9th of June, and had Conference of an Invaſion, of a Rebellion, and an Inſurrection, to be made by the Kings Subjects, to Depoſe the King, and to Kill his Children, poor Babes that never gave Offence: Here is Blood, here is a new King and Governour. In our King conſiſts all our Happineſs, and the true uſe of the Goſpel, a thing which we all wiſhed to be Settled after the Death of the Queen. Here muſt be Money to do this, for Money is the Sinew of War. Where ſhould that be had? Count Aremberg muſt procure it of Philip King of Spain, 5, or 600000 Crowns, and out of this Sum, Raleigh muſt have 8000; then there muſt be Friends to effect this. Cobham muſt go to Albert, Arch-Duke of Auſtria, for whom Aremberg was Embaſſador at that time in England: And what then? He muſt perſwade the Duke to Aſſiſt the pretended Title of Arabella. From thence Cobham muſt go to the King of Spain, and perſwade him to Aſſiſt the ſaid Title. Since the Conqueſt, there was never the like Treaſon. But out of whoſe Head came it? Out of Raleigh's, who muſt alſo adviſe Cobham to uſe his Brother Brook to Incite the Lady Arabella to write three ſeveral Letters, as aforeſaid in the Indictment; all this was on the 9th of June. Then three days after, Brook was acquainted with it: After this, Cobham ſaid to Brook, 'twill never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs are taken away. Afterwards Raleigh delivered a Book to Cobham, Treacherouſly written againſt the Title of the King. It appears that Cobham took Raleigh, To be either a God, or an Idol. Cobham endeavours to ſet up a new King, or Governor. God forbid, mine Eyes ſhould ever ſee ſo unhappy a Chance.

As for the Lady Arabella, ſhe, upon my Conſcience, hath no more Title to the Crown than I have; which, before God, I utterly Renounce. At which Sir Walter ſmiled.

Cobham, a Man bred in England, hath no Experience abroad.

Raleigh

Raleigh, a Man of great Wit Military and a Sword-Man.

Now whether of theſe Perſons was Bred in a hollow Tree, I leave to them to ſpeak of, who can ſpeak far better than my ſelf.

Sir Edward Cook, the Kings Attourney. I muſt firſt, before I come to the Cauſe, give one Caution, becauſe we ſhall often mention Perſons of eminent Places, ſome of them great Monarchs: Whatever we ſay of them, we ſhall but Repeat what others have ſaid of them; I mean the Capital Offenders in the Confeſſion: we profeſſing Law muſt ſpeak Reverently of Kings and Potentates. I perceive theſe Honourable Lords, and the reſt of this great Aſſembly, are come to hear what hath been ſcattered upon the Wreck of Rumors; we carry a Juſt mind, to Condemn no Man but upon plain Evidence. Here is Miſchief, Miſchief in Summo Gradu, Exorbitant Miſchief. My Speech ſhall chiefly touch theſe three Points; Imitation, Supportation, and Defence.

The Imitation of Evil ever exceeds the Precedent, as on the contrary Imitation of good, ever comes ſhort. Miſchief cannot be ſupported, but by Miſchief: Yea, it will ſo multiply, that it will bring all to Confuſion. Miſchief is ever underprop'd by falſhood of foul Practiſes. Becauſe all theſe things did concur in theſe Treaſons, you ſhall underſtand the Main, as before you did the Bye.

The Treaſon of the Bye, conſiſteth in theſe Points: Firſt, That the Lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the reſt, intended by Force in the Night, to Surprize the Kings Court, which was a Rebellion in the Heart, of the Realm, yea, in the Heart of the Heart, in the Court. They intended to make him, that is a Soveraign, ſubject to their Power, purpoſing to open the Doors with Muſquets and Calivers, and to take alſo the Prince and Council. Then under the Kings Authority, to carry the King to the Tower, and to make a Stale of the Admiral; when they had the King there, to Extort three things from him.

Firſt, A Pardon for all their Treaſons.

Secondly, A Toleration of the Romiſh Superſtition: Which, their Eyes ſhall ſooner fall out, than they ſhall ever ſee, for the King hath ſpoken theſe words in the hearing of many (I will looſe the Crown and my Life, before ever I will alter Religion.)

And, Thirdly, To remove Councelors: In the Room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have placed one Watſon a Prieſt, abſurd in Humanity, and ignorant in Divinity. Brooks, of whom I will ſpeak nothing, Lord Treaſurer; the great Secretary muſt be Markham. A hole muſt be found in my Lord Chief Juſtices Coat. Grey muſt be Earl Marſhal, and Maſter of the Horſe, becauſe he would have a Table in the Court: Marry, he would Advance the Earl of Worceſter to a higher Place; all this cannot be done without a Multitude.

Therefore Watſon the Prieſt telleth a Reſolute Man, That the King was in danger of Puritans and Jeſuites; ſo to bring him in blind-fold into the Action: Saying, that the King is no King till he be Crowned, therefore every Man might Right his own Wrongs; but he is Rex Natus, his Dignity Deſcends as well as yours, my Lords.

Then Watſon impoſeth a Blaſphemous Oath, that they ſhould Swear to defend the Kings Perſon, to keep ſecret what was given them in Charge, and ſeek all Ways and Means to Advance the Catholick Religion. Then they intend to ſend for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the Kings Name, to the Tower, leſt they ſhould make any Reſiſtance, and then to make Hoſtages of them; and to enjoyn them to provide for them Victuals and Munition. Grey, becauſe the King removed before Midſummer, had a further Reach, to get a company of Sword-Men to aſſiſt the Action: Therefore he would ſtay, till he had obtain'd a Regiment from Oſtend. So you ſee, theſe Treaſons were like Sampſons Foxes, which were joyned in their Tails, though their Heads were ſevered.

Raleigh. I pray remember, I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treaſon of the Prieſt.

Attourney. You are not: You ſhall obſerve three things in the Treaſons. Firſt, They had a Watch-word (the Kings ſafety) their pretence was Bonum in ſe, their intent was Malum in ſe.

Secondly, They avouched Scripture, both the Prieſts had, Scriptum eſt; perverting and ignorantly miſtaking the Scriptures.

Thirdly, They avouched the Common Law to prove, that he was no King till he was Crowned, alledging a Statute of 13. Eli. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the courſe of all Traytors.

In the 20*th* of Edward the 2*d*. Iſabella the Queen, and the Lord Mortimer, gave out, that the Kings Perſon was not ſafe, for the good of the Church and Commonwealth.

The Biſhop of Carlile did Preach on this Text (My Head is grieved) meaning by the Head, the King; that when the Head began to be Negligent, the People might reform what is amiſs.

3*d*. Henry 4*th*. Sir Roger Claringdon accompanied with two Prieſts, gave out, that Richard the 2*d* was Alive, when he was Dead.

Edward the 3*d* cauſed Mortimers Head to be cut off, for giving councel to Murther the King.

The 3. Hen. 7. Sir Henry Stanly found the Crown in the Duſt and ſet it on the Kings Head; when Fitzwater and Garret, told him that Edward the 5*th* was alive, he ſaid, If I be alive, I will aſſiſt him. But this coſt him his Head.

Edmond de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, killed a Man in the Reign of King Henry the 7*th*, for which the King would have him hold his hand at the Bar, and then Pardoned him. Yet he took ſuch offence thereat, that he ſent to the Noblemen, to help to Reform the Common-wealth; and then ſaid, he would go to France and get Power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treaſon, and diſcovered Windon and others, that were Attainted.

Temp. Eliz. Appleyard, a Traytor in Norfolk, ſaid a Man muſt have two Accuſers. Helmes was the Man that accuſed him; but Mr. Juſt. Catlin ſaid, that that Statute was not in force at that day, his words were (thruſt her into the Ditch.)

Throgmorton, in the 12*th*, or 20*th*. (Quere the Statute) ſpeaking of Accuſers, maketh this difference: An Accuſer is a ſpeaker by Report, when a Witneſs can ſpeak nothing but by his own Report.

If a Man do accuſe himſelf, it is more forcible than many Witneſſes. So then, ſo much by way of Imitation. This is the way of all Proceedings, there is Treaſon in the Heart, in the Hand, in the Mouth, in Conſummation.

The Wiſdom of the Law meeteth with them all, Corde, Ore, Progreſſione, Conſummatione; that which is in Corde, is the Root. You muſt take away Treaſon in the Root, in the Bud, in the Bloſſom.

Now I come to your Charge, you of the Jury, in Determinatione finis, and Electione mediorum. The greatneſs of Treaſon is to be conſidered in theſe two things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediorum; this Treaſon excelleth in both, for that it was to Deſtroy the King and his Progeny. Theſe Treaſons are ſaid to be Crimen læſæ Majeſtatis, this goeth further, and may be termed Crimen extirpandæ Regiæ Majeſtatis & totius Progeniei ſuæ. I ſhall not need, my Lords, to ſpeak any thing concerning the King, nor of the Bounty and Sweetneſs of his Nature, whoſe Thoughts are Innocent, whoſe Words are full of Wiſdom and Learning, and whoſe Works are full of Honour; although it be a true ſaying, Nunquam nimis quod nunquam ſatis. But to whom do you bear your Malice? to the Children?

Raleigh. To whom ſpeak you this? You tell me News I never heard of.

Attourney. Oh Sir, do I? I will prove you the Notorioufeſt Traytor that ever came to Bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: as you Sir Walter Raleigh, have followed them of the Bye in Imitation; for I will charge you with the words.

Raleigh. Your words cannot Condemn me, my Innocency is my Defence: Prove one of theſe things wherewith you have Charged me, and I will confeſs the whole Indictment; and that I am the Horribleſt Traytor that ever lived, and worthy to be Crucified with a Thouſand thouſand Torments.

Attourney. Nay, I will prove all: Thou art a Monſter, thou haſt an Engliſh Face, but a Spaniſh Heart. Now you muſt have Money: Aremberg was no ſooner in England (I Charge thee Raleigh) but thou incitedſt Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to beſtow on diſcontented Perſons.

Raleigh. Let me Anſwer.

Attourney. Thou ſhalt not.

Raleigh. It concerneth my Life.

Lord Chief Juſtice Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney is but yet in the General, but when the Kings Councel have given the Evidence wholly, you ſhall Anſwer every particular.

Attourney. Oh! do I touch you?

Lord Cecil. Mr. Attorney, when you have done with this General Charge, do you not mean to let him anſwer to every Particular?

Attourney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be Read. Raleigh procured Cobham to go to Aremberg, which he did by his Inſtigation: Raleigh Supped with Cobham before he went to Aremberg, after Supper, Raleigh conducted him to Durham Houſe; from whence Cobham went with Lawrency, a Servant of Aremberg's, unto him, and went in by a Back-way. Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertain'd this Motion, for he had four Letters from Raleigh. Aremberg anſwered, and promiſed it ſhould be performed, but knew not to whom it ſhould be diſtributed. Cobham and Lawrency came back to Durham Houſe, where they found Raleigh. Cobham and Raleigh went up, and left Lawrency below, where they had ſecret Conference in a Gallery, and after Cobham and Lawrency departed from Raleigh. Your Reaſon was Peace! What is that? Spaniſh Invaſion, Scotiſh Subverſion. And again, you are not a fit Man to take ſo much Money for procuring of a Lawful Peace, for Peace procured by Money is Diſhonourable. Then Cobham muſt go to Spain, and return by Jerzey, where where you were Captain: And then becauſe Cobham had not ſo much Policy, or at leaſt Wickedneſs as you, he muſt have your advice for the diſtribution of the Money. Will you diſpoſe of ſo good a King Lineally deſcended? For he came of Elizabeth, Eldeſt Daughter of Edward the 4th. why then muſt you ſet up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a Titular Queen, of whoſe Title I will ſpeak nothing, but ſure you meant to make her a Stale: Ah good Lady! you could mean her no good.

Raleigh. You tell me News, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. Oh Sir! I am the more large, becauſe I know with whom I deal: For we have to deal to Day with a Man of Wit.

Raleigh. Did I ever ſpeak with this Lady?

Attourney. I will Track you out before I have done: Engliſh-Men will not be lead by perſwaſion of Words, but they muſt have Books to perſwade.

Raleigh. The Book was Written by a Man of your Profeſſion, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. I would not have you Impatient.

Raleigh. Methinks you fall out with your ſelf, I ſay nothing.

Attourney. By this Book, you would perſwade Men that he is not the Lawful King. Now let us conſider ſome Circumſtances: You know my Lord Cobham (for whom we all Lament, and Rejoyce; Lament in that his Houſe, which hath ſtood ſo long Unſpotted, is now Ruinated: Rejoyce, in that his Treaſons are Revealed) is neither Politician nor Sword-Man; Raleigh was united in the Cauſe with him, and therefore cauſe of his Deſtruction. Another Circumſtance is, the ſecret Contriving of it. Humphry Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treaſon, Raleigh hath his Machivilian Pollicy, made a Sanctuary for Treaſon. He muſt talk with none but Cobham, becauſe (ſaith he) one Witneſs can never Condemn me. For Brook ſaid unto Sir Griffith Markham, take heed how you do make my Lord Cobham acquainted; for whatſoever he knoweth, Raleigh the Witch, will get it out of him. As ſoon as Raleigh was Examined on one Point of Treaſon concerning my Lord Cobham, he wrote to Cobham thus: I have been Examined of you, and confeſſed nothing. Further, you ſent to him by your truſty Francis Kemiſh, that one Witneſs could not Condemn; and therefore bad his Lordſhip be of good Courage. Came this out of Cobhams Quiver? No: But out of Raleighs Machivilian and Deviliſh Policy. Yea, but Cobham did retract it; Why then did you urge it? Now then ſee the moſt horribleſt Practices, that ever came out of the bottomleſs Pit of the loweſt Hell. After that Raleigh had intelligence that Cobham had Accuſed him, he endeavoured to have Intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young Sir John Payton: But I think it was the Error of his Youth.

Raleigh. The Lords told it me, elſe I had not been ſent to the Tower.

Attourney. Then Cobham, by the Inſtigation of Raleigh, entred into theſe Actions: So that the Queſtion will be, Whether you are not the Principaleſt Traytor, and he would nevertheleſs have entred into it? Why did Cobham Retract all that ſame? First, Becauſe Raleigh was ſo Odious, he thought he ſhould fare the worſe for his ſake. Secondly, he thought, If he be free, I ſhall clear my ſelf the better. After this Cobham asked for a Preacher to Confer with, pretending to have Doctor Andrews; but indeed, he meant not to have him, but Mr. Galloway; A Worthy and Reverend Preacher, who can do more with the King (as he ſaid) than any other; that he, ſeeing his conſtant denial, might inform the King thereof. Here he plays with the Preacher. If Raleigh could perſwade the Lords, that Cobham had no intent to Travel, then he thought all ſhould be well. Here is Forgery. In the Tower Cobham muſt write to Sir Thomas Vane, a worthy Man, that he meant not to go into Spain: which Letter Raleigh deviſed in Cobhams Name.

Raleigh. I will waſh my hands of the Indictment, and Die a true Man to the King.

Attourney. You are the abſoluteſt Traytor that ever was.

Raleigh. Your Phraſes will not prove it, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. Cobham writeth a Letter to my Lord Cecil, and doth will Mellis, his Man, to lay it in a Spaniſh Bible, and to make as though he found it by chance. This was after he had Intelligence with this Viper, then he was falſe.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me, I never had it.

Attourney. No, my Lord, you had it not. You, my Maſters of the Jury, reſpect not the Wickedneſs and Hatred of the Man, reſpect his Cauſe; if he be Guilty, I know you will have care of it, for the Preſervation of the King, the continuance of the Goſpel Authoriſed, and the Good of us all.

Raleigh. I do not hear yet, that you have ſpoken one word againſt me, here is no Treaſon of mine done: If my Lord Cobham be a Traytor, what is that to me?

Attourney. All that he did was by thy Inſtigation, thou Viper, for I Thou thee, thou Traytor.

Raleigh. It becometh not a Man of your Quality and Virtue, to call me ſo: But I take Comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Attourney. Have I angered you?

Raleigh. I am in no caſe to be angry.

Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attourney ſpeaketh out of the zeal of his Duty, for the Service of the King, and you for your Life; be Patient on both ſides.

Now they proceed to the Reading the Proofs.

The Lord Cobham's Examination.

'He confeſſeth he had a Paſs-port to go to 'the Spaniſh King, intending to go to the 'Arch-Duke to confer with him about theſe 'Practiſes; and becauſe he knew he had not 'Money to pay his own Army, from thence 'he meant to go to Spain, to deal with the 'King for the 600000 Crowns, and to re-'turn by Jerſey, and that nothing ſhould be 'done, until he had ſpoken with Sir Walter 'Raleigh for diſtribution of the Money, to 'them which were diſcontented in England. 'At the firſt beginning he breathed out Oaths 'and Exclamations againſt Raleigh, calling 'him Villain, and Traytor; ſaying, He had 'never entred into theſe Courſes, but by his 'Inſtigation, and that he would never let him 'alone.

Here Mr. Attourney willed the Clerk of the Crown Office, to read over theſe laſt words again (he would never let him alone.)

The Lord Cobham's Examination.

'Beſides he ſpake of Plots and Invaſions: 'Of the Particulars thereof he could not 'give an Account, though Raleigh and he 'had Conferred of them, becauſe he was '(as he ſaid) Confounded with them. Fur-'ther, he ſaid, He was afraid of Raleigh, that 'when he ſhould return by Jerſey, that he 'would have him and the Money to the King. 'Being Examined of Sir Arthur Gorge, he 'freed him, ſaying:

They never durſt truſt him, but Sir Arthur Savage they intended to uſe, becauſe they thought him a fit Man.

Raleigh. Let me ſee the Examination: This is all the Evidence can be brought againſt me; poor ſhifts. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you underſtand this: This is that which muſt either Condemn, or give me Life; which muſt Free me, or ſend my Wife and Children to beg their Bread about the Streets. This is that muſt prove me a notorious Traytor, or a true Subject to the King. I never ſaw this Examination before.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and ſhew you all the Examinations.

Raleigh. At my firſt Examination by my Lords at Windſor, what I knew of Cobhams practice with Aremberg, I anſwered Negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I proteſt before God, I never heard one word of it. If that be proved, let me be Guilty of a Thouſand Treaſons. It is a ſtrange thing you will impute that to me, when I never heard ſo much as the Name of Arabella Stuart, but only the Name of Arabella.

After being Examined, I told my Lords, that I thought my Lord Cobham had Conference with Aremberg, I ſuſpected his Viſiting of him: For after he departed from me at Durham Houſe, by his own Stairs, and paſſed over to St. Mary-Saviours; I knew Lawrency a Merchant, and a Follower of Aremberg, and therefore likely to go unto him. My Lord Cecil asked my Opinion concerning Lawrency; I ſaid, that if you do not Apprehend Lawrency, it is dangerous, he will flie; if you do Apprehend him, you ſhall give my Lord Cobham notice thereof. I was asked likewiſe, who was the greateſt Man with my Lord Cobham? I anſwered, I knew no Man ſo great with him, as young Wyat of Kent.

Aſſoon as Cobham ſaw my Letter to have diſcovered his Dealing with Aremberg, in his Fury he accuſed me, but before he came to the Stair-foot he repented him, and ſaid, he had done me wrong. When he came to the end of his Accuſation, he added, That if he had brought this Money to Jerſey, that I would have Delivered him to the King. Mr. Attourney, you ſaid this never came out of Cobhams Quiver, he is a ſimple Man: Is he ſo ſimple? No: He hath Diſpoſitions of his own, he will not eaſily be guided by others, but when he has once taken Head in a Matter, he is not eaſily drawn from it; he is no Babe. It is ſtrange for me to Deviſe with Cobham, that he ſhould go to Spain, to perſwade the King to Diſburſe ſo much Money, he being a Man of no Love in England, and I having reſigned my room of chiefeſt Command, the Wardenſhip of the Stanneries: It is ſtrange for me, to make my ſelf Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Cade; I knowing England to be in better Eſtate than ever it was. I knew Scotland United, Ireland Quieted, Denmark Aſſured, which before was Suſpected. I knew, that having a Lady whom Time had Surprized, we had now a lawful Succeſſor. The State of Spain was not unknown known to me. I had Written a Diſcourſe, which I had intended to preſent unto the King, againſt Peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniard had ſix Repulſes, three in Ireland, and three at Sea, and once in 1588 at Cales, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was Diſcouraged and Diſhonoured. I knew the King of Spain to be the proudeſt Prince living; but now he cometh Creeping to the King my Maſter, for Peace. I knew whereas before he had in his Ports 6 or 7 ſcore Sail of Ships, he hath now but Six or Seven. I knew of Twenty Five Milions he had from his Indies, he hath ſcarce one left. I knew him ſo Poor, that the Jeſuites in Spain, were feign to Beg at the Church-Door. Was it ever Read or Heard, that any Prince ſhould Disburſe ſo much Money, without a ſufficient Pawn? I knew her own Subjects, the Citizens of London, would not Lend her Majeſty Money without Lands in Morrgage. I knew the Queen did not Lend the States Money, without Fluſhing, Brill, and other Towns for a Pawn. And can it be thought, he would let Cobham have ſo great a Sum?

I never came to the Lord Cobham's, but about matters of his Profit, as the Ordering of his Houſe, Paying of his Servants Board-wages, &c. I had of his when I was Examined, Four Thouſand Pounds worth of Jewels for a Purchaſe; a Pearl of Three Thouſand Pound, and a Ring worth Five Hundred Pound: If he had had a fancy to Run away, he would not have left ſo much to have Purchaſed a Leaſe in Fee Farm. I ſaw him Buy Three Hundred Pounds worth of Books, to ſend to his Library at Canterbury, and a Cabinet of Three Hundred Pound to give to Mr. Attourney, for drawing the Conveyances and God in Heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to Travel. But for that practice with Arabella, or Letters to Aremberg, or any Diſcourſe with him, or in what Language he ſpake unto him, if I knew any of theſe things, I would abſolutely confeſs the Indictment, and acknowledg my ſelf worthy a Thouſand Deaths.

Cobham's Examination Read.

The Lord Cobham being required to Subſcribe to an Examination, there was ſhewed a Note under Raleigh's hand, whereupon, when he had peruſed it, he pawſed, and after brake forth into theſe Speeches: Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! I will now tell you all the Truth: And then ſaid, His purpoſe was to go into Flanders, and into Spain, for the Obtaining the aforeſaid Money, and that Raleigh had appointed to meet him in Jerſey as he returned Home, to be adviſed of him about the Diſtribution of the Money.

Popham, Lord Chief Juſtice. When Cobham anſwered to the Interrogatories, he made ſcruple to Subſcribe, and being urged to it, he ſaid, If he might hear me affirm, that a Perſon of his Degree ought to ſet his Hand, he would; I lying then at Richmond, for fear of the Plague, was ſent for, and I told he ought to Subſcribe; otherwiſe it were a Contempt of a high Nature: Then he Subſcribed. The Lords Queſtioned with him further, and he ſhewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my Lord Cecil: He deſired to ſee the Letter again, and then ſaid, Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! whereby I perceived you had not performed that Truſt he had repoſed in you.

Raleigh. He is as paſſionate a Man as Lives, for he hath not ſpared the beſt Friends he hath in England. My Lords, I take it, he that hath been Examined, hath ever been asked if it be according to his meaning, and then to Subſcribe. Methinks, my Lords, when he Accuſes a Man, he ſhould give ſome Account and Reaſon of it; it is not ſufficient to ſay, we Talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham ſome Arguments, whereby to perſwade the King of Spain, and anſwer his Objections. I knew Weſtmorland and Bothwell, Men of other Underſtandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their Bread.

Sir Thomas Fowler, one of the Jury. Did Sir Walter Raleigh write a Letter to my Lord before he was Examined concerning him?

Attourney. Yes.

Lord Cecil. I am in great Diſpute with my ſelf, to ſpeak in the Caſe of this Gentleman: A former Dearneſs between me and him tied ſo firm a Knot of my Conceit of his Virtues, now broken by a Diſcovery of his Imperfections. I proteſt, did I ſerve a King that I knew would be diſpleaſed with me for ſpeaking, in this Caſe I would ſpeak, whatever came of it: But ſeeing he is compacted of Piety and Juſtice, and one that will not miſlike of any Man for ſpeaking a Truth, I will Anſwer your Queſtion.

Sir Walter Raleigh was ſtaid by me at Windſor, upon the firſt News of Copley, that the Kings Perſon ſhould be Surpriſed by my Lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I ſuſpected Cobham, then I doubted Raleigh to be a partaker. I ſpeak not this, that it ſhould be thought, I had greater Judgment than the reſt of my Lords, in making this haſt to have him Examined; Raleigh following to Windſor, I met with with him upon the Tarras, and willed him as from the King, to ſtay, ſaying, The Lords had ſomething to ſay to him: Then he was Examined, but not concerning my Lord Cobham, but of the Surprising Treason, what he said of Cobham, he delivered unto us in such sort as of a Brother he might: We sent for my Lord Cobham to Richmond, where he stood upon his Justification, and his Quality; sometimes being Froward, he said he was not bound to Subscribe, wherewith we made the King acquainted. Cobham said, if my Lord Chief Justice would say it were a Contempt, he would Subscribe, whereof being resolved, he Subscribed. There was a Light given to Aremberg, that Lawrency was Examined, but that Raleigh knew that Cobham was Examined, is more than I know.

Raleigh. If my Lord Cobham had trusted me in the Main, was not I as fit a Man to be trusted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Raleigh did by Letters acquaint us, that my Lord Cobham had sent Lawrency to Aremberg, when he knew not he had any Dealings with him.

Lord H. How. It made for you, if Lawrency had been only acquainted with Cobham, and not with you. But you knew his whole Estate, and were acquainted with Cobham's Practice with Lawrency; it was known before that Lawrency depended on Aremberg.

Attourney. 1. Raleigh protesteth against the Surprising Treason. 2. That he knew not of the Matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, Sir Walter, with a matter of Falshood: You say, you suspected the intelligence that Cobham had with Aremberg, by Lawrency.

Raleigh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but such as might be Warranted.

Attourney. Then it was but lawful Suspicion. But to that whereas you said, that Cobham had accused you on Passion, I answer three Ways. 1. I observed when Cobham said, Let me see the Letter again; he pawsed and when he did see that Count Aremberg was touched, he cried out, Oh Traytor! Oh Villain! now will I Confess the whole truth. 2. The Accusation of a Man on Hear-say, is nothing: Would he Accuse himself on Passion, and Ruinate his Cause and Posterity, out of Malice to accuse you? 3. Could this be out of Passion? Mark the manner of it: Cobham had told this at least two Months before to his Brother Brook, You are Fools, you are on the Bye, Raleigh and I are on the Main, we mean to take away the King and his Cubs; this he delivered two Months before. So mark the manner of the Matter, he would not turn the Weapon against his own Bosom, and accuse himself to accuse you.

Raleigh. Hath Cobham confessed that?

Lord Chief Justice. This is spoken by Mr. Attourney, to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of Passion.

Raleigh. Let it be proved that Cobham said so.

Attourney. Cobham saith, He was a long time doubtful of Raleigh, that he would send him to the King. Did Cobham fear least you would betray him in Jersey? Then of necessity there must be Trust between you. No Man can betray a Man, but he that is trusted, in my understanding. This is the greatest Argument to prove, that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Raleigh hath a deeper reach than to make himself, as he said, Robin Hood, a Kett, or Cade, yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traytor; they say he was an Out-law. And whereas he saith, that our King is not only more Wealthy and Potent than his Predecessors, but also more Politick and Wise, so that he could have no hope to prevail. I answer, There is no King so Potent, Wise and Active, but he may be overtaken through Treason. Whereas you say Spain is so Poor, Discoursing so largely thereof, it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been so well acquainted with the State of Spain. Besides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joyned, you might have hope to prevail. For his six Overthrows, I answer, He hath the more Malice, because Repulses breed desire of Revenge. Then you say, you never talked with Cobham but about Leases, and Letting Lands, and Ordering his House; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchin, &c. If you had fallen on your Knees at first, and Confessed the Treason, it had been better for you. You say, he meant to have given me a Cabinet of Three Hundred Pound, perhaps he thought by those means, to have Anticipated me therewith. But you say, all these are Circumstances. I answer, all this Accusation in Circumstance is true: here now I might appeal to my Lords, that you take hold of this, that he Subscribed not to the Accusation.

Lord H. How. Cobham was not then pressed to Subscribe.

Attourney. His Accusation being Testified to the Lords, is of as great Force, as if he had Subscribed. Raleigh saith again, if the Accuser be alive, he must be brought Face to Face to speak, and alledges 25. Edw. 3. That there must be sufficient Witness that must be brought Face to Face before the Accused, and alledgeth 10. and 13. Eliz.

Raleigh. You try me by the Spanish Inquisition, if you proceed only by the Circumstances without two Witnesses.

Attourney. This is a Treasonable speech.

Raleigh:

Raleigh. Evertere hominem Juſtum in cauſa ſua, Injuſtum eſt: Good my Lords, let it be proved either by the Laws of the Land, or by the Laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witneſſes appointed; yet I will not ſtand to defend this Point in Law, if the King will have it ſo: it is no rare thing to be falſly Accuſed. A Judg Condemned a Woman in Sarum, for killing her Husband, on the Teſtimony of one Witneſs; afterwards his Man confeſſed the Murder, when ſhe was Executed. Who after, being toucht in Conſcience for the Judgment, was uſed to ſay, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in Vita ſua Purgaret. It is alſo Commanded by the Scripture, Deut. 17. In Ore duorum aut trium Teſtium, &c. and 19. Non ſtabit unus Teſtis, contra aliquem, &c.

If Chriſt requireth it, as it appeareth, Matth. 18. If St. Paul, 2 Cor. 13. St. John &c. If by the Statute, Civil Law, and Gods Word, it be required that there muſt be two Witneſſes at the leaſt, bear with me if I deſire one.

I would not deſire to Live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings: I had been a Slave, a Villain, a Fool, if I had endeavoured to ſet up Arabella, and refuſed ſo Gracious a Lord and Soveraign: But urge your Proofs.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You offered Queſtions on divers Statutes, all which mention two Accuſers in caſe of Indictments; you have deceived your ſelf, for the Laws of 25. Ed. 3. and 5. Ed. 6. are Repeal'd. It ſufficeth now if there be Proofs made either under Hand, or by Teſtimony of Witneſſes, or by Oaths; it needs not the Subſcription of the Party, ſo there be Hands of Credible-Men, to Teſtifie the Examination.

Raleigh. It may be an Error in me, and if thoſe Laws be Repeal'd, yet I hope the Equity of thoſe Laws remains ſtill, but if you Affirm it, it muſt be a Law to Poſterity; the Proof of the Common Law is by Witneſs and Jury, let Cobham be here, let him ſpeak it: Call my Accuſer before my Face, and I have done.

Attourney. Scientia ſceleris eſt mixta Ignorantia: You have read the Letter of the Law, but underſtand it not. Here was your Anchor-hold, and your Randeſvouze, you truſt to Cobham, either Cobham muſt accuſe you, or not accuſe you; if he did, then it would not hurt you, becauſe he is but one Witneſs, if he did not, then you are ſafe.

Raleigh. If ever I read word of the Law, or Statute before I was Priſoner in the Tower, God Confound me.

Attourney. Now I come to Prove the Circumſtances of the Accuſation to be true. Cobham confeſſed he had a Paſs-port to Travel, hereby intending to preſent Overtures to the Arch-Duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have Conference with the King for Money: You ſay he promiſed to come Home by Jerzey, to make Merry with you and your Wife.

Raleigh. I ſaid, in his return from France, not Spain.

Attourney. Further, in his Examination, he ſaith nothing could be ſet down for the Diſtribution of the Money to the Diſcontented, without Conference with Raleigh. You ſaid it ſhould have been for procurement of Peace, but it was for raiſing Rebellion. Further, Cobham ſaith, he would never have entred into theſe Courſes, but by your Inſtigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your Schollar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots, that is enough for you to do, that are his Maſter: You intended to truſt Sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be an Honeſt and True Gentleman, but not Sir Arthur Gorge.

Raleigh. All this is one Accuſation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accuſation he never Subſcribed nor Avouched it. I beſeech you, my Lords, let Cobham be ſent for, charge him on his Soul, on his Allegience to the King; if he Affirm it, I am Guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, it is the Evidence againſt you, muſt it not be of Force without his Subſcription? I deſire to be reſolved by the Judges, whether by the Law it is not a forcible Argument of Evidence.

The Judges. It was.

Raleigh. The King at his Coronation, is ſworn In omnibus Judiciis ſuis Æquitatem, non Rigorem Legis obſervare: By the Rigour and Cruelty of the Law, it may be a forcible Evidence.

Lord Chief Juſtice. That is not the Rigour of the Law, but the Juſtice of the Law, elſe when a Man hath made a plain Accuſation, by Practice he might be brought to Retract it again.

Raleigh. Oh my Lord! you may uſe Equity.

Lord Chief Juſtice. That is from the King, you are to have Juſtice from us.

Andrews. The Law is, if the Matter be proved to the Jury, they muſt find you Guilty; for Cobham's Accuſation is not only againſt you, there are other things ſufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that Sir Walter Raleigh is ſatisfied, that Cobham's Subſcription is not neceſſary: I pray you Mr. Attourney go on.

Raleigh. Good Mr. Attourney be patient, and give me leave.

Lord Cecil. An unneceſſary Patience is a hindrance, let him go on with his Proofs, and then Refel them.

Raleigh. I would anſwer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a Table, and Pen, and Ink, you ſhall.

Then Paper and Ink was given him.

Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter, which the Lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the effect of his former Examination, further ſaying, I have diſcloſed all; to Accuſe any falſly, were to burthen my own Conſcience.

Attourney. Read Coplies Confeſſion the 8*th* of June, he ſaith, He was offered a 1000 Crowns to be in this Action.

Here Watſons Additions were read.

"The great Maſs of Money from the "Count was impoſſible, ſaith Brook, &c.

Brook's his Confeſſion read.

"There have Letters paſſed, ſaith he, be-"tween Cobham and Aremberg, for a great "Sum of Money, to Aſſiſt a ſecond Action, "for the Surpriſing of his Majeſty.

Attourney. It is not poſſible, it was of Paſſion; For it was in Talk before three Men being ſeverally Examined, who agreed in the ſum to be beſtowed on diſaffected Perſons. That Grey ſhould have 12000 Crowns, and Raleigh ſhould have 8000, or 10000 Crowns.

Cobhams Examination, July 18.

"If the Money might be procured (ſaith "he) then a Man may give Penſions. Be-"ing asked if a Penſion ſhould not be given "to his Brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrency's Examination.

"Within five Days after Aremberg ar-"rived, Cobham reſorted unto him. That "Night that Cobham went to Aremberg with "Lawrency, Raleigh Supped with him.

Attourney. Raleigh muſt have his part of the Money, the efore now he is a Traytor. The Crown ſhall never ſtand one Year on the Head of the King (my Maſter) if a Traytor may not be Condemned by Circumſtances. For if A. tells B. and B. tells C. and C. D. &c. you ſhall never prove Treaſon by two Witneſſes.

Raleigh's Examination was Read.

He confeſſeth Cobham offered him 8000 Crowns, which he was to have for the furtherance of the Peace, between England and Spain; and that he ſhould have it within three Days. To which, he ſaid, he gave this Anſwer, When I ſee the Money, I will tell you more; for I had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle Conceipts, and therefore made no accompt thereof.

Raleigh. The Attourney hath made a long Narration of Copley, and the Prieſts, which concerns me nothing, neither know I how Cobham was altered. For he told me, if I would agree to the Peace, he would get me 8000 Crowns. I asked him, Who ſhall have the reſt of the Money? He ſaid, I will offer ſuch a Noble-Man (who was not named) ſome of the Money. I ſaid, he will not be perſwaded by you, and will extreamly hate you for ſuch a Motion. Let me be Pinched to Death with hot Irons, if ever I knew there was any Intention to beſtow the Money on Diſcontented Perſons. I had made a Diſcourſe againſt the Peace, and would have Printed it: If Cobham changed his mind, if the Prieſts, if Brook had any ſuch intent, what is that to me? They muſt anſwer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremberg came, that is difference of time.

Sergeant Philips. Raleigh confeſſeth the Matter, but avoideth it, by diſtinguiſhing of Times. You ſaid it was offered you before the coming of Aremberg; which is falſe. For you being Examined whether you ſhould have ſuch Money of Cobham, or not: You ſaid yea, and that you ſhould have it within two or three Days. Nemo moriturus præſumitur mentiri.

Lord Hen. How. Alledg me any Ground or Cauſe, wherefore you gave ear to my Lord Cobham for receiving Penſions, in Matters you had not to deal with?

Raleigh. Could I ſtop my Lord Cobhams Mouth.

Lord Cecil. Sir Walter Raleigh preſſeth, that my Lord Cobham ſhould be brought Face to Face. If he ask things of Favour and Grace, they muſt come only from him that gives them. If we Sit here as Commiſſioners, how ſhall we be ſatisfied, whether he ought to be brought, unleſs we hear the Judges ſpeak?

Lord Chief Juſtice. This thing cannot be granted, for then a number of Treaſons ſhould flouriſh: The Accuſer may be drawn by Practice, whilſt he is in Perſon.

Judg Gawdy. The Statute you ſpeak of, concerning two Witneſſes, in caſe of Treaſon is found to be inconvenient; therefore by another Law it was taken away.

Raleigh. The common Trial of England, is by Jury and Witneſſes.

Lord Chief Juſtice. No, by Examination: If three Conſpire a Treaſon, and they all Confeſs it; here is never a Witneſs, yet they are Condemned.

Judg Warburton. I marvel, Sir Walter, that you being of ſuch Experience and Wit, ſhould ſtand on this Point; for ſo, many Horſe-ſtealers may eſcape, if they may not be Condemned without Witneſſes. If one ſhould

ſhould ruſh into the Kings Privy-Chamber, whilſt he is alone, and Kill the King (which God forbid) and this Man be met coming with his Sword drawn all bloody; Shall not he be Condemned to Death? My Lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been Laboured withal; and to ſave you, his old Friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath ſaid.

Raleigh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Raleigh. Indeed where the Accuſer is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuſer may, he is alive, and in the Houſe. Suſanna had been Condemned, if Daniel had not cried out: Will you condemn an innocent Iſraelite, without Examination or Knowledg of the truth? Remember, it is abſolutely the Commandment of God: If a falſe Witneſs riſe up, you ſhall cauſe him to be brought before the Judges, if he be found falſe, he ſhall have the Puniſhment which the Accuſed ſhould have had. It is very ſure for my Lord to Accuſe me is my certain Danger, and a means to Excuſe himſelf.

Lord Chief Juſtice. There muſt not ſuch a Gap be opened for the Deſtruction of the King, as would be, if we ſhould grant this. You Plead hard for your ſelf, but the Laws Plead as hard for the King. I did never hear that Courſe to be taken in a Caſe of Treaſon. There hath been Intelligence between you, and what underhand Practices there may be, I know not. If the Circumſtances agree not with the Evidence, we will not Condemn you.

Raleigh. The King deſires nothing but the knowledg of the Truth, and would have no advantage taken by Severity of the Law. If ever we had a Gracious King, now we have! I hope, as he is, ſuch are his Miniſters. If there be but a Trial of five Marks at the Common Law, a Witneſs muſt be depoſed. Good my Lords, let my Accuſer come Face to Face, and be depoſed.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have no Law for it: God forbid any Man ſhould accuſe himſelf upon his Oath.

Attourney. The Law preſumes, a Man will not accuſe himſelf to accuſe another. You are an odious Man: For Cobham thinks his Cauſe the worſe, that you are in it. Now you ſhall hear of ſome Stirs to be raiſed in Scotland.

Part of Coplies Examination.

"Alſo Watſon told me, that a ſpecial Per-"ſon told him, that Aremberg offered to him
"a Thouſand Crowns; and that Brook ſaid,
"the Stirs in Scotland came out of Raleigh's
"Head.

Raleigh. Brook hath been taught his Leſſon.

Lord H. How. This Examination was taken before me; Did I teach him his Leſſon?

Raleigh. I proteſt before God, I meant it not by any Privy Councellor.

Raleigh's Examination.

"The way to Invade England, were to "begin with Stirs in Scotland.

Raleigh. I think ſo ſtill: I have ſpoken it to divers of the Lords, by way of Diſcourſe and Opinion.

Attourney. Now let us come to thoſe words of Deſtroying the King and his Cubs.

Raleigh. O barbarous! If they like unnatural Villains, ſhould uſe thoſe words, ſhall I be Charged with them? I will not hear it, I was never Falſe to the Crown of England. I have ſpent 40000 Crowns of mine own, againſt the Spaniſh Faction, for the Good of my Country. Do you bring the words of theſe Helliſh Spiders, Clark, Watſon, and others, againſt me?

Attourney. Thou haſt a Spaniſh Heart, and thy ſelf art a Spider of Hell; for thou confeſſeſt the King to be a moſt Sweet and Gracious Prince, and yet haſt Conſpired againſt him.

Watſons Examination Read.

"He ſaid, that George Brook told him
"twice, That his Brother, the Lord Cob-
"ham, ſaid to him, that you are but on the "Bye, but Raleigh and I are on the Main.

Brook's Examination Read.

"Being askt what was meant by this Far-
"gon the Bye and the Main, he ſaid, That "the Lord Cobham told him, that Grey and "others, were in the Bye, he and Raleigh
"were on the Main. Being askt what Ex-
"poſition his Brother made of theſe words,
"he ſaid, he is loath to Repeat it. And "after ſaith, by the Main, was meant, the "taking away of the King and his Iſſue.
"And thinks on his Conſcience, it was in-"fuſed into his Brother's Head by Raleigh.

Cobham's Examination Read.

"Being askt if ever he had ſaid, It will "never be well in England, till the King
"and his Cubs were taken away. He ſaid,
"he had anſwered before, and that he would
"anſwer no more to the Point.

Raleigh. I am not named in all this: There is a Law of two Accusers, one of his own Knowledg, another by Hear-say.

Earl of Suffolk. See the Case of Arnold.

Lord Chief Justice. It is the Case of Sir William Thomas, and Sir Nicholas Arnold.

Raleigh. If this may be, you will have any Mans Life in a Week.

Attourney. Raleigh saith, That Cobham was in a Passion when he said so. Would he tell his Brother any thing of Malice against Raleigh, whom he loved as his life?

Raleigh. Brook never loved me; until his Brother had accused me, he said nothing.

Lord Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think, that Brook accused you, he was only in the Surprising Treason; for by accusing you, he should accuse his Brother.

Raleigh. He doth not care much for that.

Lord Cecil. I must Judg the best. The Accusation of his Brother was not Voluntary; he pared every thing, as much as he could, to save his Brother.

Cobhams Examination Read.

"He saith, he had a Book Written a-"gainst the Title of the King, which he "had of Raleigh, and that he gave it to "his Brother: Raleigh said, it was foolishly "Written.

Attourney. After the King came within Twelve Miles of London, Cobham never came to see him, and intended to Travel without seeing the Queen, and the Prince. Now in this Discontentment, you gave him the Book, and he gave it to his Brother.

Raleigh. I never gave it him, he took it off my Table. For I well remember, a little before that time, I received a Challenge from Sir Amias Preston, and for that I did intend to Answer it, I resolved to leave my Estate settled, therefore laid out all my loose Papers, amongst which was this Book.

Attourney. I observe there was Intelligence between you and Cobham, in the Tower; for after he said, it was against the Kings Title, he denied it again.

Sir William Wade. First my Lord Cobham confesseth it, and after he had Subscribed it, he revoked it again: To me he always said, that the Drift of it was against the Kings Title.

Raleigh. I protest before God, and his Works, I gave him not the Book.

Nota. Sir Robert Wroth speaketh, or Whispereth something secretly.

Attourney. My Lords, I must complain of Sir Robert Wroth; he says this Evidence is not Material.

Sir Robert Wroth. I never spake the words.

Attourney. Let Mr. Serjeant Philips testifie, whether he heard them.

One of the Commissioners then said. I will give my word for Sir Robert Wroth.

Sir Robert Wroth. I will speak as truly as you, Mr. Attourney, for by God, I never spake it.

Lord Chief Justice. Wherefore should this Book be Burnt?

Raleigh. I Burned it not.

Serj. Philips. You presented your Friend with it, when he was discontented. If it had been before the Queens Death, it had been a less matter; but you gave it him presently when he came from the King, which was the time of his discontentment.

Raleigh. Here is a Book supposed to be Treasonable; I never Read it, nor Urged it.

Attourney. This is cunning.

Raleigh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh against me is probable.

Attourney. Lord Cobham saith, that Kemish came to him with a Letter torn, and did wish him not to be dismaid, for one Witness could not hurt him.

Raleigh. This poor Man hath been close Prisoner this Eighteen Weeks; he was offered the Rack to make him Confess. I never sent any such Message by him, I only Writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attourney; having of his at that time a great Pearl, and a Diamond.

Lord H. Howard. No Circumstance moveth me more, than this. Kemish was never on the Rack, the King gave Charge, that no Rigour should be used.

Commissioners. We protest before God, there was no such Matter intended, to our knowledges.

Raleigh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack sent for, and he threatned with it?

Sir William Wade. When Mr. Sollicitor and my self Examined Kemish, we told him he deserved the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commissioners. It was more than we knew.

Cobham's Examination Read.

"He saith, Kemish brought him a Letter "from Raleigh, and that part which was con-"cerning the Lords of the Council, was rent "out; that he was Examined, and cleared "him of all; and that the Lord H. Howard "said, because he was discontent, he was fit "to be in the Action. And further, that "Kemish said to him from Raleigh, that he "should be of good Comfort, for one Wit-"ness could not condemn a Man for Treason.

Lord Cecil. Cobham was asked when he heard from you, he said, Every Day.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. Kemiſh added more, I neve bad him ſpeak theſe words.

Nota. Mr. Attourney offered to interrupt him.

Lord Cecil. It is his laſt Diſcouſe. Give him leave Mr. Attourney.

Raleigh. I am accuſed concerning Arabella, concerning Money out of Spain. My Lord Chief Juſtice ſaith, a Man may be Condemned with one Witneſs, yea, without any Witneſs. Cobham is Guilty of many things, Conſcientia mille Teſtes. He hath accuſed himſelf, what can he hope for but Mercy? My Lords, vouchſafe me this Grace. Let him be brought, being alive, and in the Houſe; let him avouch any of theſe things, I will confeſs the whole *Indict*ment, and Renounce the Kings Mercy.

Lord Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near Kinſwoman of the Kings. Let us not Scandal the innocent by confuſion of Speech: She is as innocent of all theſe things as I, or any Man here; only ſhe received a Letter from Cobham, to prepare her; which ſhe Laught at, and immediately ſent it to the King. So far was ſhe from Diſcontentment, that ſhe Laught him to ſcorn. But you ſee how far the Count of Aremberg did conſent.

The Lord Admiral (Notingham) being by in a Standing, with the Lady Arabella, ſpake to the Court.

The Lady doth here Proteſt upon her Salvation, that ſhe never dealt in any of theſe things.

Lord Cecil. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come to ſpeak with her, and gave her to underſtand, that there were ſome about the King, that laboured to Diſgrace her; ſhe doubted it was but a Trick. But Brook ſaith, his Brother moved him to procure Arabella to Write Letters to the King of Spain: But he ſaith, he never did it.

Raleigh. The Lord Cobham hath accuſed me, you ſee in what manner he hath Forſworn it. Were it not for his Accuſation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the Letter which Lawrency brought to him from Aremberg. Let me ſpeak for my Life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not Excuſe me. If you grant me not this Favour, I am ſtrangely uſed. Campian was not denied to have his Accuſers face to face.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Since he muſt needs have Juſtice, the Acquitting of his old Friend may move him to ſpeak otherwiſe than the truth.

Raleigh. I have been the infuſer of all theſe Treaſons into him. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this, he ſaid I have been the Cauſe of all his Miſeries, and the Deſtruction of his Houſe; and that all Evil hath happened unto him, by my wicked Councel. If this be true, whom hath he cauſe to Accuſe, and to be Revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as Revengful, as any Man on Earth.

Attourney. He is a Party, and may not come, the Law is againſt it.

Raleigh. It is a Toy to tell me of Law. I defie Law, I ſtand on the Fact.

Lord Cecil. I am afraid my often Speech (who am inferiour to my Lords here preſent) will make the World think, I delight to hear my ſelf Talk. My affection to you, Sir Walter Raleigh, was not extinguiſhed, but ſlaked, in regard of your deſerts. You know the Law of the Realm, (to the which your Mind doth not conteſt) that my Lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Raleigh. He may be, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. But do you Challenge it?

Raleigh. No.

Lord Cecil. You ſay that my Lord Cobham, your main Accuſer, muſt come to accuſe you. You ſay, he hath Retracted: I ſay many Particulars are not Retracted. What the Validity of all this is, is meerly left to the Jury. Let me ask you this, If my Lord Cobham will ſay, you were the only Inſtigator of him to proceed in the Treaſons, dare you put your ſelf on this?

Raleigh. If he will ſpeak it before God and the King, that ever I knew of Arabella's Matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the Surpriſing Treaſon; I put my ſelf on it, Gods Will and the Kings be done with me.

Lord H. Howard. How if he ſpeak things Equivalent to that you have ſaid?

Raleigh. Yes, in a main Point.

Lord Cecil. If he ſay, you have been the Inſtigator of him to deal with the Spaniſh King, had not the Council cauſe to draw you hither?

Raleigh. I put my ſelf on it.

Lord Cecil. Then, Sir Walter Raleigh, think on God, and prepare your ſelf; for I do verily believe, my Lords will Prove this. Excepting your Faults (I call them no worſe) by God, I am your Friend. The Heat and Paſſion in you, and the Attourney's Zeal in the Kings Service, makes me ſpeak this.

Raleigh. Whoſoever is the Workman, it is reaſon he ſhould give Account of his Work to the Work-Maſter. But let it be Proved that he acquainted me with any of his Conference with Aremberg: he would ſurely have given me ſome Account.

Lord Cecil. That follows not. If I ſet you on Work, and you give me no Account, am I therefore Innocent?

Attourney. For Arabella, I ſaid ſhe was never acquainted with the Matter. Now that Raleigh had Conference in all theſe Treaſons, it is manifeſt; The Jury hath heard the Matter. There is one Dyer, a Pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal Gentleman, who asked him if the King of England were Crowned yet? To whom he anſwered, I think not yet, but he ſhall be ſhortly. Nay, ſaith the Portugal, that ſhall he never be, for his Throat will be cut by Don Raleigh, and Don Cobham, before he be Crowned.

Dyer was called and Sworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a Merchants Houſe in Lisbon, to ſee a Boy that I had there; there came in a Gentleman into the Houſe, and inquiring what Countryman I was, I ſaid an Engliſh-Man: Whereupon he asked me, if the King were Crowned? And I anſwered, that I hoped he ſhould be ſo ſhortly. Nay, ſaith he, he ſhall never be Crowned, for Don Raleigh, and Don Cobham, will cut his Throat ere that Day come.

Raleigh What infer you upon this?

Attourney. That your Treaſon hath Wings.

Raleigh. If Cobham did practice with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the Duke of Buckingham with Jack Straw's Treaſon, but that it was to Countenance his Treaſon?

Conſider, you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no Cauſe ſo doubtful, which the Kings Council cannot make good againſt the Law. Conſider my Diſability, and their Ability: They Prove nothing againſt me, only they bring the Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, which he hath Lamented and Repented as heartily, as if it had been for a horrible Murther. For he knew, that all this Sorrow which ſhould come to me, is by his means. Preſumptions muſt proceed from Precedent, or Subſequent Facts. I have ſpent 40000 Crowns againſt the Spaniard. I had not Purchaſed 40 Pound a Year. If I had Died in Guiana, I had not left 300 Marks a Year to my Wife and Son. I that have always Condemned the Spaniſh Faction, me-thinks it is a ſtrange thing that now I ſhould affect it! Remember what St. Auſtin ſays, Sic Judicate tanquam abalio mox Judicandi; unus judex, unum Tribunal. If you would be contented on Preſumptions delivered, to be Slaughtered, to have your Wife and Children turned into the Streets to beg their Bread; If you would be contented to be ſo Judged, Judg ſo of me.

Serj. Philips. I hope to make this ſo clear, as that the Wit of Man ſhall have no Colour to anſwer it. The Matter is Treaſon in the higheſt Degree, the end to Deprive the King of his Crown. The particular Treaſons are theſe: Firſt, To raiſe up Rebellion; and, to effect that, to procure Money; to raiſe up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a Treaſonable Book againſt the Kings right to the Crown; the purpoſe, to take the Life of his Majeſty and his Iſſue. My Lord Cobham confeſſeth Sir Walter Raleigh guilty thereof. The Queſtion is, Whether he be Guilty as joyning with him, or Inſtigating of him? The courſe to Prove this, was by my Lord Cobham's Accuſation. If that be true, he is Guilty; if not, he is Clear. So, whether Cobham ſay true, or Raleigh? That is the Queſtion. Raleigh hath no Anſwer, but the Shadow of as much Wit, as the Wit of Man can deviſe. He uſeth his bare Denial; the denial of a Defendant muſt not move the Jury. In the Star-Chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in Queſtion, his denial on his Oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in Propria cauſa. Therefore much leſs in Matters of Treaſon. Cobhams Teſtification againſt him before then, and ſince, hath been largly diſcourſed.

Raleigh. If Truth be Conſtant, and Conſtancy be in Truth, Why hath he Forſworn that that he hath ſaid? You have not Proved any one thing by direct Proofs, but all by Circumſtances.

Attourney. Have you done? The King muſt have the laſt.

Raleigh. Nay, Mr. Attourney, he which ſpeaketh for his Life, muſt ſpeak laſt. Falſe Repetitions and Miſtakings muſt not mar my Cauſe. You ſhould ſpeak Secundum allegata & probata. I appeal to God and the King, Whether Cobham's Accuſation be ſufficient to Condemn me.

Attourney. The Kings Safety, and your Clearing, cannot agree. I proteſt, I never knew a clearer Treaſon.

Raleigh. I never had intelligence with Cobham ſince he came to the Tower.

Attourney. Go too, I will lay thee upon thy Back, for the Confidenteſt Traytor that ever came at a Bar. Why ſhould you take 8000 Crowns for a Peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not ſo impatient, good Mr. Attourney, give him leave to ſpeak.

Attourney. If I may not be patiently heard, you will incourage Traytors, and diſcourage Us. I am the Kings ſworn Servant, and muſt ſpeak: If he be Guilty he is a Traytor, if not, deliver him.

Nota. Here Mr. Attourney ſat down and would ſpeak no more, until the Commiſſioners missioners urged and intreated him to go forward, and then proceeded.

Attourney. You had intelligence with Cobham, within four Days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spaniſh, and deſired Penſion of 1500 Pound a Year from Spain that Spain by him might have Intelligence, then Raleigh is a Traytor. He hath taken an Apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my Lord Cobham's Window; the Contents whereof were this. It is doubtful whether we ſhall be proceeded with or no, perhaps you ſhall not be Tried. This was to get a Retractation. Oh! it was Adam's Apple, whereby the Devil did deceive him. Further, he Wrote thus, Do not as my Lord of Eſſex did, take heed of a Preacher; for by his perſwaſion he confeſſed, and made himſelf Guilty. I doubt not, but this Day, God ſhall have as great a Conqueſt by this Traytor, and the Son of God ſhall be as much Glorified, as when it was ſaid, Viciſti Galilee; you know my meaning. Though Cobham Retracted, yet he could not reſt nor ſleep, until he had Confirmed it again. If this be not enough to Prove him a Traytor, the King my Maſter ſhall not Live three Years to an end.

Nota. Here Mr. Attourney produceth the Lord Cobhams Letter, and as he read it, Inſerted ſome ſpeeches.

I have thought it fit, to ſet down this to my Lords, wherein I profeſs on my Soul, to write nothing but the truth. I am come now near to the Period of my Time, therefore I confeſs the truth before God, and his Angels. Raleigh, four days before I came from the Tower, cauſed an Apple (Eves Apple) to be thrown in at my Chamber-window; the effect of it was to intreat me to right the Wrong that I had done him, in ſaying, that I ſhould have come Home by Jerſey, which under my Hand to him, I have Retracted. His firſt Letter I anſwered not, which was thrown in the ſame manner, wherein he prayed me to write him a Letter, which I did. He ſent me word that the Judges met at Mr. Attourney's Houſe, and that there was good hope the Proceedings againſt us ſhould be ſtaied; he ſent me another time a little Tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Raleigh dealt with me, to procure him a Penſion of 1500 Pound a Year, for which he promiſed that no Action ſhould be againſt Spain, but he would give knowledg before-hand. He told me the States had Audience with the King. (Ah, is not this a Spaniſh Heart in an Engliſh Body?) He hath been the original Cauſe of my Ruine; for I had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his inſtigation. He hath been alſo the cauſe of my Diſcontentment; he adviſed me, not to be overtaken with Preachers, as Eſſex was, and that the King would better allow of a conſtant Denial, than to Accuſe any.

Attourney. Oh damnable Atheiſt! he hath learned ſome Text of Scripture, to ſerve his his own purpoſe, but falſly alledged. He counſels him, not to be Counſelled by Preachers, as Eſſex was: He died the Child of God, God Honoured him at his death; thou waſt by when he died, Et Lupus & Turpes inſtant morientibus urſæ. He died indeed for his Offence. The King himſelf ſpake theſe words; He that ſhall ſay Eſſex died not for Treaſon is puniſhable.

Raleigh. You have heard a ſtrange Tale of a ſtrange Man; he hath Matter enough to me; but the King, and all of you ſhall Witneſs by our Deaths, which of us was the Ruine of other. I bid a poor Fellow throw in the Letter at his Window, written to this purpoſe, You know you have undone me, now write three Lines to juſtifie me. In this I will Die, that he hath done me Wrong: Why did not he acquaint me with his Treaſons, if I acquainted him with my Diſpoſitions?

Attourney. But what ſay you now of this Letter?

Raleigh. I ſay that Cobham is a baſe Diſhonourable poor Soul.

Attourney. Is he Baſe? I return it into thy Throat, on his behalf: But for thee, he had been a good Subject.

Nota. Here Raleigh pulled a Letter out of his Pocket, which the Lord Cobham had written to him, and deſired my Lord Cecil to read it, becauſe he only knew his Hand; the Effect of it was as followeth.

Cobhams Letter of Juſtification to Raleigh.

"Seeing my ſelf ſo near my End, for the "diſcharge of my own Conſcience, and "freeing my ſelf from your Blood, which "elſe will cry Vengeance againſt me: I pro-"teſt upon my Salvation, I never Practiſed "with Spain by your Procurement; God "ſo Comfort me in this my Affliction, as "you are a true Subject, for any thing that "I know. I will ſay as Daniel, Purus ſum "a Sanguine hujus. So God have Mercy on "my Soul, as I know no Treaſon by you.

Nota. This was the laſt Evidence, whereupon a Marſhal was Sworn, to keep the Jury private. The Jury departed, and ſtaied not a Quarter of an Hour, but returned, and gave their Verdict Guilty.

Serg. Heath demanded Judgment againſt the Priſoner.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Raleigh, Thou haſt been Indicted, Arraigned, and pleaded not Guilty, for all theſe ſeveral Treaſons, and for Trial thereof, haſt put thy ſelf upon thy Country; which Country are theſe, who have found thee Guilty. What canſt thou ſay for thy ſelf, why Judgment and Execution of Death, ſhould not paſs againſt thee?

Raleigh. My Lords, the Jury have found me Guilty. They muſt do as they are directed. I can ſay nothing why Judgment ſhould not proceed. You ſee whereof Cobham hath Accuſed me. You remember his Proteſtations, that I was never Guilty. I deſire the King ſhould know of the wrongs done unto me, ſince I came hither.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have had no wrong, Sir Walter.

Raleigh. Yes, of Mr. Attourney. I deſire my Lords, to remember three things to the King. 1. I was Accuſed to be a Practiſer for Spain: I never knew that my Lord Cobham meant to go thither, I will ask no Mercy at the Kings Hands, if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the Practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my Lord Cobham's Practice with Aremberg, nor of the Surpriſing Treaſon.

Lord Chief Juſtice. In my Conſcience I am perſwaded, that Cobham hath Accuſed you truly. You cannot deny, but that you were dealt with, to have a Penſion to be a Spie for Spain; therefore you are not ſo true to the King, as you have proteſted your ſelf to be.

Raleigh. I ſubmit my ſelf to the King's Mercy, I know his Mercy is greater than my Offence. I recommend my Wife and Son, of tender Years, unbrought up, to his Compaſſion.

Lord Chief Juſtice. I had thought I ſhould never have ſeen this Day, to have ſtood in this place againſt you; becauſe I thought it impoſſible, that one of ſo great Parts, ſhould have fallen ſo grievouſly. God hath beſtowed on you many Benefits. You had been a Man fit, and able to have ſerved the King in good Place. You had brought your ſelf into good State of Living, if you had entred into a good Conſideration of your Eſtate, and not ſuffered your own Wit to have Intrapped your ſelf, you might have lived in good Comfort. It is beſt for Man not to ſeek to Climb too high, leſt he fall; nor yet to Creep too low, leſt he be Trodden on. It was the Poſie of the Wiſeſt and greateſt Councellor, of his Time in England, In medio ſpatio mediocria firma locantur. You might have Lived well with 3000 Pound a Year, for ſo I have heard your Revenues to be. I know nothing might move you to be diſcontented; but if you had been Down, you know Fortunes Wheel, when it is turned about, riſeth again. I never heard that the King took away any thing from you, but the Captainſhip of the Guard, which he did with good Reaſons, to have one of his own Knowledg, whom he might Truſt in that Place. You have been taken for a Wiſe Man, and ſo have ſhewed Wit enough this Day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. If the King had ſaid, it is a Matter that offends my People, ſhould I burthen them for your particular good? I think you could not well take it hardly, that his Subjects were eaſed, though by your private hindrance. Two Vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager Ambition, the other Corrupt Covetouſneſs. Ambition, in deſiring to be advanced to equal Grace and Favour, as you have been before-time; that Grace you had then, you got not in a Day or Year. For your Covetouſneſs, I am ſorry to hear that a Gentleman of your Wealth, ſhould become a baſe Spie for the Enemy, which is the Vileſt of all other; wherein, on my Conſcience, Cobham hath ſaid true: by it you would have increaſed your Living 1500 Pound a Year. This Covetouſneſs is like a Canker, that eats the Iron place where it Lives. Your Caſe being thus, let it not grieve you, if I ſpeak a little out of Zeal, and Love, to your good. You have been Taxed by the World, with the Defence of moſt Heatheniſh, and Blaſphemous Opinions, which I liſt not to Repeat, becauſe Chriſtian Ears canno tendure to hear them, nor the Authors and Maintainers of them ſuffered to Live in any Chriſtian Common-wealth. You know what Men ſaid of Harpool. You ſhall do well before you go out of the World, to give Satisfaction therein, and not to Die with theſe *I*mputations on you. Let not any Devil perſwade you to think, there is no Eternity in Heaven, for if you think thus, you ſhall find Eternity in Hell-Fire. *I*n the firſt Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, I obſerved his manner of ſpeaking; I proteſt before the Living God, I am perſwaded he ſpoke nothing but the truth. You wrote, that he ſhould not in any caſe Confeſs any thing to a Preacher, telling him an Example of my Lord of Eſſex, that noble Earl that is gone; who if he had not been carried away with others, had Lived in Honour to this Day among us. He confeſſed his Offences, and obtained Mercy of the Lord, for I am verily perſwaded in my Heart, he died a worthy Servant of God. Your conceit of not confeſſing any thing, is very inhumane and Wicked. This is the time of Confeſſing, that we may be Abſolved at the Day of Judgment. You have ſhewed a fearful ſign of denying God, in adviſing a Man not to confeſs. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuſer Face to Face, for ſuch a one is eaſily brought to Retract, when he ſeeth there is no hope of his own Life. It is dangerous that any Traytors ſhould have any Acceſs one to another, or Conference; when they ſee themſelves muſt Die, they will think it beſt to have their Fellow Live, that he may commit the like Treaſon again, and ſo in ſome ſort ſeek Revenge.

Now it reſteth to Pronounce the Judgment, which I wiſh you had not been this Day to have received: For if the Fear of God in you, had been anſwerable to your other Parts, you might have Lived to have been a ſingular Subject. I never ſaw the like Trial, and I hope, I ſhall never ſee the like again.

The Judgment.

But ſince you have been found Guilty of theſe Horrible Treaſons, you ſhall be had from hence to the Place whence you came, there to remain until the Day of Execution; and from thence you ſhall be Drawn upon a Hurdle through the Streets, to the Place of Execution, there to be Hanged and Cut down alive, and your Body ſhall be opened, your Heart and Bowels pluckt out, and your Privy Members cut off and thrown into the Fire, before your Eyes; then your Head to be ſtrucken off from your Body, which ſhall be divided into four Quarters, to be diſpoſed at the Kings Pleaſure: And God have Mercy upon your Soul.

Here follows the Continuation of the Life.

IT was obſerved that before the Lords (principally to my Lord Cecil) at Wincheſter (for there he was tryed, the Sickneſs then reigning at London) he was humble, but not proſtrate; dutiful, but not deject: For in ſome caſes he would humbly thank them for gracious Speeches; in other acknowledge that their Honours ſaid true, as in relating ſome circumſtances. And in ſuch points wherein he would not yield unto them, he would crave pardon, and with reverence urge them, and anſwer them as in points of Law, or eſſential matters of Fact. To the Jury he was affable, but not fawning; hoping, but not truſting in them; carefully perſwading them with Reaſon, not diſtemperately importuning them with Conjurations; rather ſhewing love of Life, than fear of Death. What made ill for Sir Walter, was his diſcovery of Laurency and Cobham's frequent private Conferences; which ſo incens'd Cobham that he poſitively accuſed him, though the ſingle Evidence of one already convicted of what Sir Walter was but yet impeach'd, could only make a Circumſtance, and not convict him. The Judges and the King's Counſel did what they could to bawl him out of his Life, and ſince they wanted Proof, they would endeavour to tire him out. If we may believe Osborn, ſeveral of the Jury-men, after he was caſt, were ſo far touch'd in conſcience as to ask of him pardon on their knees.

A further Confirmation of his Innocency may be a paſſage of his own in a Letter to Secretary Winwood, wherein he tells him, "That the "worthy Prince of VVales was extream curious in ſearching out the nature "of his Offences. The Queens Majeſty had inform'd her ſelf from the be-"ginning. The King of Denmark at both times of his being here, was through-"ly ſatisfied of his Innocency; they would otherwiſe never have moved his "Majeſty on his behalf. The Wife, the Brother, and the Son of a King do "not uſe to ſue for Men ſuſpect. Nay, further yet, the Scots themſelves declar'd in favour of him, if we may believe him in another Letter of his to Sir Robert Car, after Earl of Somerſet, wherein are theſe words, "I have ever "been bound to your Nation, as well for many other graces, as for the true "report of my Tryal to the King's Majeſty, againſt whom had I been ma-"lignant the hearing of my Cauſe could not have changed Enemies into "Friends, Malice into Compaſſion, and the minds of the greateſt number "then preſent, into the Commiſeration of mine Eſtate: It is not the nature "of foul Treaſon to beget ſuch fair Paſſions; neither could it agree with the "duty and love of faithful Subjects (eſpecially of your Nation) to bewail his "overthrow that had conſpired againſt their moſt natural and liberal Lord.

Two days after Raleigh's Tryal, were ſentenced Brook, who pretended his intention was only to try faithful Subjects, and ſaid he had a Commiſſion for ſo doing, but produc'd it not. Markham, who confeſt the Indictment, pleaded Diſcontent, and deſired Mercy. VVatſon, who confeſt he drew them all in, holding the King to be no Sovereign till he were crown'd, inſtancing in Saul, and Jeroboam; And Clark, who ſaid the like. Parham and Brooksby were acquitted by the Jury; Watſon, Clark and Brook were executed; Markham, Cobham, and Grey brought ſeverally on the Scaffold to dye, and at the inſtant on the Block, had their particular Executions remitted, by a Letter to the Sheriff under the King's own Hand, without the knowledge of any, ſave Mr. Gibbs, Gentleman of the Bedchamber, that brought it. However, an evil fate did attend theſe Men; Grey died in the Tower, the laſt of his Line; the reſt were diſcharg'd, but died miſerably poor: Markham and ſome others abroad; abroad; but Cobham (as Osborn tells us) in a Room aſcended by a Ladder, at a poor Womans houſe in the Minories (formerly his Landreſs) died rather of hunger than a natural diſeaſe.

Sir Walter was left to his Majeſties Mercy, who thought him too great a Male-content to have his Freedom, and probably too innocent to loſe his Life. Therefore in the Tower he is confin'd, but permitted to enjoy Libera Cuſtodia; where he improv'd his Impriſonment to the greateſt advantage of Learning and Inquiſitive Men. Since his Majeſty had civilly buried him, and as it were baniſh'd him this World, he thought it no Treaſon to diſturb the Aſhes of former times, and bring to view the Actions of deceas'd Heroes. And certainly none was ſo fit to comment on their Atchievements, and ſo able to raiſe excellent Maximes from them, as he who had been brought up in ſo wiſe a Court as Queen Elizabeths, and read ſo many wiſe Men. After ſome time paſt there, he was delivered of that great Minerva the Hiſtory of the World, a Book which for the exactneſs of its Chronology, curiouſneſs of its Contexture and Learning of all ſorts, ſeems to be the Work of an Age. An Hiſtory which never yet met with a Detractor, and was the Envy, if ſome Authors are to be credited, of King James himſelf, who thought none could out-do him at the Pen. That a Man who had been the greateſt part of his life taken up in Action, ſhould write ſo judiciouſly, ſo critically of Times and Actions, is as great a Wonder as the Book it ſelf. It ſtill remains a diſpute whether the Age he lived in was more obliged to his Pen or his Sword, the one being buſie in conquering the New, the other in ſo bravely deſcribing the Old World. An Hiſtory wherein the only fault, or defect rather, is, that it wanteth one half thereof; Which was occaſioned, as our Story tells us, thus: Some few days before he ſuffered he ſent for Mr. Walter Burr, who formerly printed his firſt Volumn of the Hiſtory of the World, whom taking by the Hand, after ſome other diſcourſe, he ask'd how it had ſold? Mr. Burr returned this Anſwer, It ſold ſo ſlowly that it had undone him. At which words of his Sir Walter ſtepping to his Desk, reaches his other unprinted part of his Hiſtory, which he had brought down to the Times he lived in, and clapping his hand upon his breaſt, ſaid with a ſigh, Ah my Friend, hath the firſt Part undone thee? the ſecond Part ſhall undo no more; this ungratefull World is unworthy of it: and immediately going to the Fire-ſide threw it in, and ſet his foot on it till it was conſumed. As great a loſs to Learning as Chriſtendom could have ſuſtained; the greater, becauſe it could be repaired by no hand but his. It often happening to Authors, as to great Maſters in Painting, their Pieces are not valued till they are dead, and the ſucceeding Age find the Originals inimitable.

Whilſt Sir Walter was thus confined, Death took away his and Eſſex's mortal Enemy Sir Robert Cecil, after Earl of Salisbury, who had purchaſed the monopoly of Favour, and being jealous of Sir Walter's Parts, had ſome fear he might ſupplant him; which was the cauſe, according to Osborn, that he was brought to the aforementioned Tryal. However Sir Walter outlived his Enemies deſigns and hatred, and for all his kindneſſes, beſtowed upon him the following Epitaph, which I am upon very good grounds aſſured to be his. King James was ſo much taken with the ſmartneſs of it, that he hoped the Author would die before him. The Verſes are theſe.

Here lies Hobinal, our Paſtor while ere,
That once in a quarter our fleeces did ſhear.
To pleaſe us, his Cur he kept under clogg,
And was ever after both Shepherd and Dog.
For oblation to Pan his cuſtom was thus,
He firſt gave a trifle, then offer'd up us.
And through his falſe Worſhip ſuch pow'r he did gain,
As kept him 'oth Mountain, and us on the Plain:
Where many a Hornpipe he tun'd to his Phillis,
And ſweetly ſung Walſingham to's Amarillis,
Till Atropos clapt him, a Pox on the Drab,
For ſpight of his Tarbox he dy'd of the Scab.

If the Reader deſires a Key to theſe Verſes, he may meet with it in Osborn's Memoirs, who yet for all his Intelligence hath not informed us that his Miſtreſſes name was Walſingham.

Fourteen Years Sir Walter had ſpent in the Tower, and being weary of a ſtate wherein he could be only ſerviceable by his Pen, but not in a capacity of ſerving and enriching his Country any other way, (Of whom Prince Henry would ſay, that no King but his Father would keep ſuch a Bird in a Cage;) At length he fell upon an Enterprize of a Golden Mine in Guiana in the Southern parts of America. The Propoſition of this was preſented and recommended to his Majeſty by Sir Ralph Winwood the Secretary of State, as a matter not in the Air, or Speculative, but Real and of certainty, for that Sir Walter had ſeen of the Ore of the Mine, and tried the richneſs of it, having gotten a pound from thence by the hands of Captain Kemiſh his ancient Servant.

Sir Ralph Winwood's Recommendations of the Deſign, and the earneſt Solicitations for his Enlargement of the Queen, the Prince, and the French Leiger, (with much affection to his Deſerts, not without ſome Politick Deſigns on Spain) together with the Aſſeverations of Sir Walter of the Truth of the Mine, work'd upon his Majeſty, who thought himſelf in Honour obliged, nay in a manner engaged (as the Declaration which he publiſhed after the Death of Sir Walter tells us) not to deny unto his People the Adventure and Hope of ſo great Riches, to be ſought and atchieved at the Charge of Voluntiers, eſpecially ſince it ſtood ſo well with his Majeſties Politick and Magnanimous Courſes in theſe his flouriſhing Times of Peace, to nouriſh and encourage Noble and Generous Enterprizes for Plantations, Diſcoveries, and opening of a new Trade.

Count Gondamor (an active and ſubtile Inſtrument to ſerve his Maſter's ends) took Allarm at this, and repreſented to his Majeſty the Enterprize of Sir Walter to be hoſtile, and predatory, intending to a breach of the Peace between the two Crowns. But notwithſtanding, Power at laſt is granted to Sir Walter to ſet forth Ships and Men for that Service. However, the King commanded him upon pain of his Allegiance to give him under his Hand (promiſing on the Word of a King to keep it ſecret) the number of his Men, the burthen and ſtrength of his Ships, together with the Country and River which he was to enter; which being done accordingly by Sir Walter, that very Original Paper was found in the Spaniſh Governours Cloſet at St. Thoma. So active were the Spaniſh Miniſters, that Advertiſement was ſent to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before the Engliſh Fleet got out of the Thames.

But

But as we have just cause to admire the more than usual Activity of the Spanish Agents, so may we wonder no less at the Miscarriage of his Majesties present Ministers, who notwithstanding he had past his Royal Word to the contrary, yet they did help Count Gondamor to that very Paper; So much both King and Court were at Gondamor's service.

A Commission indeed is granted, but by Gondamor's means is limited; that the Fleet should commit no Outrages upon the King of Spain's Subjects by Land, unless they began first; with other limitations in the Commission, which for the Readers Curiosity and Satisfaction I have here inserted.

JAMES by the Grace of GOD, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come, to be read, heard, or seen, and to every of them greeting. Whereas Sir Walter Raleigh Knight, intendeth to undertake a Voyage by Sea and Shipping, unto the South parts of America, or elsewhere within America, possessed and inhabited by Heathen and Savage People, to the end, to discover and find out some Commodities and Merchandizes in those Countries, that be necessary and profitable for the Subjects of these Our Kingdoms and Dominions, whereof the Inhabitants there make little or no use or estimation; whereupon also may ensue by Trade and Commerce, some propagation of the Christian Faith, and reformed Religion amongst those Savage and Idolatrous People: And Whereas We are credibly informed, that there are divers Merchants and Owners of Ships, and others, well disposed to assist the said Sir Walt. Raleigh in this his Enterprise, had they sufficient assurance to enjoy their due parts of the Profits returned (in respect of the Peril of Law wherein the said Sir Walter Raleigh now standeth:) And Whereas also We are informed, that divers other Gentlemen, the Kinsmen and Friends of the said Sir Walt. Raleigh, and divers Captains and other Commanders, are also desirous to follow him, and to adventure their Lives with him, in this his Journey, so as they might be commanded by no other than himself.

Know ye, that We, upon deliberate Consideration had of the Premisses, being desirous by all ways and means to work and procure the benefit and good of Our loving Subjects, and to give our Princely furtherance to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, his Friends and Associates herein, to the Incouragement of others in the like laudable Journeys and Enterprizes, to be hereafter prosecuted and pursued; and especially in advancement and furtherance, as well of the Conversion of Savage People, as of the increase of the Trade, Traffique, and Merchandizes used by Our Subjects of this Our Kingdom, being most famous throughout all Nations: Of Our special Grace, certain knowledg, and meer motion, have given and granted, and by these Presents for Us, Our Heirs, and Successours, do give and grant unto the said Sir Walt. Raleigh, full Power and Authority, and free License and Liberty out of this Our Realm of England, or any other Our Dominions; to have, carry, take, and lead, for and towards his said intended Voyage into the said South parts, or other parts of America, (possessed and inhabited, as aforesaid) and to Travel thither, all such, and so many of Our loving Subjects, or any other Strangers that will become Our loving Subjects, and live under Our Obeysance and Allegiance, as shall willingly accompany him, with sufficient Shipping, Armour, Weapons, Ordnance, Munition, Powder, Shot, Habiliments, Victuals, and such Wares and Merchandizes, as are esteemed by the Wild People in those parts, Clothing, Implements, Furniture, Cattel, Horses and Mares, and all other such things as he shall think most necessary for his Voyage, and for the use and defence of him and his Company, and Trade with the People there; and in passing and returning to and fro, and in those parts to give away, Sell, Barter, Exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same Goods, Merchandizes, and Premises, to the most benefit, and at the Will and pleasure of the said Sir Walter Raleigh and his Company, and such other Person or Persons, as shall be Adventurers or Assistants with, or unto him in this his intended Voyage, and from thence to Return, Import, Convey, and bring into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, such Gold, Silver, Bullion, or any other Wares, or Merchandizes, or Commodities whatsoever, as they shall think most fit and convenient; and the same being so Returned, Imported, Conveyed, and brought into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, to have, take, keep, retain, and convert to the only proper Use, Benefit, and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and other Persons Adventurers and Assistants with, or to him in his Voyage, without the Let, Interruption, Molestation, and Disturbance of Us, Our Heirs or Successors, or any the Officers, or Ministers of Us, Our Heirs, or Successors whatsoever, Paying and Answering unto Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, the full fifth part in five parts to be divided, of all such Gold, and Silver, and Bullion, and Oar of Gold, or Silver, and Pearl, and precious Stone, as shall be Imported over and besides, and together with such Customs, Subsidies, and other Duties, as shall be due for, or in respect of any other Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoever to be so Imported by the true meaning of these Presents. And to the end the said Sir Walter Raleigh may be the more Encouraged to go forward in this his Enterprise, and all Our loving Subjects desirous to be Adventurers with him, or Assistant unto him, may be the more incited to further his Procedings: We do hereby in verbo Regio, for Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, Covenant, Promise, and Grant, to and with the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all other Persons that shall accompany him, or to be attendant upon him, or to be Adventurers or Assistants with, or to him in this his Voyage, that no Gold, Silver, Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoe-ſoever, of what kind or ſort ſoever, by him or them, or any of them to be Imported into this Our Kingdom of England, or any other Our Dominions, from any the ſaid South, or other parts of America (Poſſeſſed or Inhabited, as aforeſaid) ſhall be attached, ſeized, or taken by Us, Our Heirs, or Succeſſors, or to the uſe of Us, Our Heirs, or Succeſſors, or by any the Officers or Miniſters of Us, Our Heirs, or Succeſſors Whatſoever; But that the ſame, and every of them (the fifth part of the ſaid Gold, Silver, or Bullion, and Oar of Gold and Silver, and Pearl and precious Stones, and other the Cuſtoms and Duties aforeſaid, being truly anſwered and payed) ſhall be, and remain to the ſole and proper uſe and behoof of the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh, and his ſaid Company, and ſuch Perſons as ſhall be Adventurers with him, or Aſſiſtant to him in this his Voyage; any Law, Statute, Act of Parliament, Proclamation, Proviſion, or Reſtraint, or any Right, Title, or Claim of Us, Our Heirs or Succeſſors, or any other matter or thing Whatſoever to the contrary in any Wiſe notwithſtanding. And further, of Our more eſpecial Grace, certain knowledg, and meer motion, We do hereby for Us, Our Heirs, and Succeſſors, Ordain, conſtitute and appoint the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh to be the ſole Governor and Commander of all Perſons that ſhall Travel, or be with him in the ſaid Voyage, to the ſaid South, or other parts of America (ſo Poſſeſſed and Inhabited as aforeſaid) or in returning from thence. And We do hereby give unto him, full Power and Authority to Correct, Puniſh, Pardon, Govern, and Rule them, or any of them, according to ſuch Orders, Ordinances, Conſtitutions, Directions, and Inſtructions, as by the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh ſhall be from time to time Eſtabliſhed, aſwel in caſes Capital and Criminal, as Civil, both Marine and other; So always as the ſaid Statutes, Ordinances and Proceedings (as near as conveniently may be) be agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Government and Policy of this Our Realm of England, and not againſt the true Chriſtian Faith now profeſſed in the Church of England. And becauſe that in ſuch and the like Enterpriſes and Voyages, great Inconveniences have grown by the mutinous and diſorderly carriage of the Marriners and Saylors imployed in the ſame, for want of ſufficient Authority to Puniſh them according to their Offences: We do therefore by theſe Preſents for Us, our Heirs and Succeſſors, give full Power and Authority to the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh, in caſe of Rebellion, or Mutiny by Sea or Land, to uſe and exerciſe Marſhal Law (upon juſt ground and apparent neceſſity) in as large and ample manner as our Lieutenant General by Sea or Land, or our Lieutenants in our Counties, within Our Realm of England, have, had, or ought to have by force of their Commiſſion of Lieutenancy. And We do further by theſe Preſents, give full Power and Authority to the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh, to Collect, Nominate and Appoint, ſuch Captains and other inferiour Commanders and Miniſters under him, as ſhall be requiſite for the better ordering and governing of his Company, and the good of the Voyage. Per breve de privato Sigillo.

With

With this Commiſſion, and the Company of ſeveral brave Captains, and other Knights and Gentlemen of great Blood, and Worth, he ſet out in Queſt of the Mine, with a compleat Fleet of Twelve Sail. Letting fall a Speech at his Departure, which was rather an Argument of his Wit, than his Wiſdom, That his whole Hiſtory of the World, had not the like Preſident: Of a Kings Priſoner to purchaſe Freedom, and his boſome Favourite to have the Halter; but in Scripture, Mordecai and Haman: Meaning himſelf and the Duke of Sommerſet. To which he was told, that the King replied, He might Die in that deceit; which he did, for Sommerſet was ſaved. Of whom was made good, what Sir Walter uſed to ſay of Favourites; That Minions were not ſo happy as Vulgar Judgments thought them, being frequently Commanded to uncomely, and ſometimes to unnatural Imployments.

On the 17*th* of November, he Arrived at Guiana, having been much Retarded by contrary Winds, and having loſt ſeveral of his Voluntiers in the Voyage, by a violent Calenture. But of the whole Tranſactions, Sir Walter hath given us an exact Account, in his Letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary; which I have here Tranſcribed.

SIR,

AS I have not hitherto given you any Account of our Proceedings and Paſſages towards the Indies, ſo have I no other Subject to Write of, than of the greateſt Misfortunes that ever befel any Man. For whereas for the firſt, all thoſe that Navigate between Cape de Verd, and America, do paſs between Fifteen or Twenty Days at moſt, we found the Wind ſo contrary, and (which are alſo contrary to Nature) ſo many Storms and Rains, as we ſpent ſix Weeks in the Paſſage; by reaſon whereof, and that in ſo great Heat, we wanted Water. For at the Iſle Prano of Cape de Vred, we Loſt our Anchors and Cables, and our Water-Casks; and being driven from the Iſle with a Hurricane, we were like all to have Periſhed. Great ſickneſs fell amongſt us, and carried away great Numbers of our ableſt Men, both for Sea and Land. The 17th of November, we had ſight of Guiana, and ſoon after came to Anchor in five Degrees of the River Galliano; here we ſtay'd till the 4th of December, landed our Sick-men, ſet up our Barges and Shalops, which were brought out of England in Quarters, waſhed our Ships, and took in Freſh-water, being Fed and Cheriſhed by the Indians of my old Acquaintance, with a great deal of Love and Reſpect. My ſelf being in the hands of Death this ſix Weeks, and not able otherwiſe to move, then as I was carried in a Chair, gave order to five ſmall Ships to ſail into Orinoque, having Captain Kemiſh for their Conductor towards the Mines: And in thoſe five Ships, five Companies of fifty, under the Command of Captain Parker, Capt. North, Brethren to the Lord Monteagle, and the Lord North, valiant Gentlemen, and of infinite Patience, for the Labour, Hunger, and Heat, which they have endured: My Son had the third Company, Capt. Thornix of Kent, the fourth Company, Capt. Chidley, by his Lieutenant, the fifth. But as my Serjeant Major, Captain Piggot, died in the former miſerable Paſſage, ſo my Lieutenant, Sir Warham Saint Leiger, lay ſick without hope of Life, and the Charge conferred on my Nephew, George Raleigh, who had alſo ſerved long with infinite Commendations; but by reaſon of my abſence, and of Sir Warhams, was not ſo well Obeyed as the Enterpriſe required. As they paſſed up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and ſhot at us, both with their Ordnance and Muskets; whereupon the Companies were forced to Charge them, and ſoon after Beat them out of the Town. In the Aſſault, my Son (more desirous of Honour than safety) was slain; with whom, to say truth, all the respects of this World have taken end in me; and although these five Captains had as weak Companies as ever followed valiant Leaders, yet were there amongst them some Twenty or Thirty valiant Adventurous Gentlemen, and of singular Courage; as of my Sons Company, Mr. Knivet, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Langworth, Mr. John Pleasington; his Officers, Sir John Hambden, Mr. Simon Leak, Corporal of the Field, Mr. Hammond, the Elder Brother, Mr. Nicholas of Buckingham, Mr. Roberts of Kent, Mr. Perin, Mr. Tresham, Mr. Mullinax, Mr. Winter and his Brother, Mr. Wray, Mr. Miles Herbert, Mr. Bradshaw, Captain Hall, and others.

Sir, I have set down the Names of these Gentlemen, to the end, that if his Majesty shall have cause to use their service, it may please you to take Notice of them for very sufficient Gentlemen. The other five Ships staid at Trinidado, having no other Port capable of them near Guiana. The second Ship was Commanded by my Vice-Admiral Captain John Pennington, of whom (to do him right) he is one of the sufficientest Gentleman for the Sea, that England hath. The third by Sir Warham Saint Leiger, an exceeding Valiant and Worthy Gentleman. The fourth by Sir John Fern. The fifth by Captain Chidley, of Devon. With these five Ships I daily attended their Armada of Spain, which had they set upon us, our Force divided, the one half in Orinoque 150 miles from us, we had not only been torn in Pieces, but all those in the River had also Perished, being of no Force at all for Sea-fight. But we had resolved to be Burnt by their sides, had the Armada arrived: But belike, they stay'd for us at Margaret, by which they knew we must pass to the Indies. For it pleased his Majesty to value us at so little, as to command me upon my Allegiance, to set down under my hand the Country and River by which I was to enter it; to set down the Number of my Men, and Burthen of my Ships, and what Ordnance every Ship carried; which being known to the Spanish Ambassador, and by him, unto the King of Spain, a dispatch was made, and Letters sent from Madrid, before my departure out of the Thames. For his first Letter sent by a Barque of Advice, was Dated the 19th of March, 1617. at Madrid, which Letter I have here inclosed sent to your Honour; the rest I reserve, not knowing whether they may be Intercepted or not. The second by the King, dated the second of May, sent also by a Colonel of Diego de Polonioque, Governor of Guiana, Elderedo, and Trinidado. The third by the Bishop of Perericho, and delivered to Polonioque, the 15th of July at Trinidado. And the fourth was sent from the Farmer and Secretary of his Customes in the Indies. At the same time by that of the Kings Hand sent by the Bishop, there was also a Commission for the speedy Levying of 300 Souldiers, and ten Pieces of Ordnance, to be sent from Portriche, for the Defence of Guiana. One 150 from Nueno Remo de Grando, under the Command of Captain Anthony Musica; and the other 150 from Portricho, to be Conducted by Captain Francis Landio.

Now Sir, if all that have Traded to the Indies since his Majesties time, knew that the Spaniards have Flayed alive all the Poor Men which they have taken, being but Merchant-Men, what Death and cruel Torment shall we expect, if they Conquer us? Certainly, they have hitherto failed grosly, being set out thence as we were, both for Number, Time, and Place.

Lastly, to make an Apologie for not Working the Mine (though I know his Majesty expected it, whom I am to satisfie as much as my self) having lost my Son and my Estate in the Enterprise; yet it is true, that the Spaniards took more care to defend the Passage leading unto it, than they did the Town, which by the Kings Instructions they might easily do, the Countries being Aspera & Nemorosa.

But

But it is true, that when Captain Kemiſh found the River low, and that he could not approach the Banks in moſt places near the Myne by a mile, and where he found a Deſcent, a Volley of Muskets came from the Woods upon the Boat, and ſlew two Rowers, and hurt ſix others, and ſhot a valiant Gentleman of Captain Thornix, of which Wound he languiſheth to this day. He, to wit, Capt. Kemiſh, following his own Advice, though that it was in vain to diſcover the Myne; for he gave me this for an Excuſe at his return, that the Companies of Engliſh in the Town of St. Thome, were not able to Defend it againſt the daily and nightly Aſſaults of the Spaniards, that the Paſſages to the Mynes were thick and unpaſſable Woods, and that the Myne being Diſcovered, they had no Men to work it, did not Diſcover it at all: For it is true, the Spaniards having two Gold Mines near the Town, the one poſſeſſed by Pedro Rodrigo de Paran, the ſecond by Harmian Frotinio, the third of Silver by Captain Franciſco, for the want of Negroes to work them; for as the Indians cannot be conſtrained, by a Law of Charles the 5th, ſo the Spaniards will not, nor can endure the Labour of thoſe Mines, whatſoever the Bragadocio, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador ſaith. I ſhall prove under the Proprieters hands, by the Cuſtom Book, and the Kings Quinto, of which I recovered an Ingot or two: I ſhall alſo make it appear to my Prince, or State, that will undertake it, how eaſily thoſe Mines, and and five or ſix more of them may be Poſſeſſed, and the moſt of them in thoſe Parts, which have never as yet been Attempted by any, nor by any Paſſage to them, nor ever Diſcovered by the Engliſh, French, or Dutch. But at Kemiſh's return from Orinoque, when I rejected his counſel and his courſe, and told him that he had undone me, and wounded my Credit with the King paſt Recovery, he ſlew himſelf: For I told him, that ſeeing my Son was ſlain, I cared not if I had loſt 100 more in opening the Myne, ſo my Credit had been ſaved. For I proteſt before God, had not Capt. Whitney (to whom I gave more countenance, than to all the Captains of my Fleet) run from me at the Granadoes, and carried another Ship with him of Capt. Woolaſtons: I would have left my Body at St. Thome, by my Sons, or have brought with me out of that or other Mynes, ſo much Gold Oar as ſhould have ſatisfied the King. I propounded no vain thing; what ſhall become of me I know not. I am unpardoned in England, and my poor Eſtate conſumed, and whether any Prince will give me Bread or no, I know not. I deſire your Honour to hold me in your good Opinion, to remember my Service to my Lord of Arundel and Pembrook, to take ſome Pity on my poor Wife, to whom I dare not write for renewing her ſorrow for her Son; and I beſeech you to give a Copy of this to my Lord Carew, for to a broken Mind, a ſick Body, and weak Eyes, it is a Torment to write many Letters. I have found many things of Importance for Diſcovering the State and Weakneſs of the Indies, which, if I live, I ſhall hereafter Impart unto your Honour, to whom I ſhall remain a faithful Servant,

WALTER RALEIGH.

Whilſt this Action of St. Thome was performed, and the Repulſe in the way to the Mine, Sir Walter ſtay'd at St. Pont de Gallo, the ſpace of nine Weeks, where the unwelcome News was brought him of the Loſs of his Son, and the Defeat they met with in their Deſign upon the Myne. However this ill News could not alter the Reſolutions of Sir Walter, of Returning to England, though he knew he ſhould meet with ſeveral Enemies there, who had by their Calumnies, rendred the Voyage nothing but a Deſign; and though ſeveral of his Men were for Landing at New-found-Land. For if we may believe himſelf at the Hour of his Death, the two Noble Earls, Thomas of Arundel, and William of Pembrook, Engaged him to Return; and Sir Walter was reſolved, though inevitable Danger threatned him, to keep his Promiſe.

No ſooner had they arrived upon the Coaſts of Ireland, but the Taking and Sacking of St. Thome, and the Firing of the Town, and putting the Spaniards there to the Sword (though in their own Defence) was Noiſed abroad in all Parts, and was by ſpecial Advertiſement, come unto the knowledg of Count de Gondamor. Who thereupon deſiring Audience of his Majeſty, ſaid he had but one word to ſay; his Majeſty much wondring what might be delivered in one word: When he came before him, he only Bawled out, Pyrates, Pyrates, Pyrates. A very pretty ſhort Speech for an Ambaſſador. Whereupon his Majeſty Publiſhed his Royal Proclamation, for the Diſcovery of the truth of Sir Walt. Raleigh's Proceedings, and the Advancement of Juſtice. But after all this Noiſe, Sir Walter is not queſtioned for his Guiana Action, for it is believed, not without very good Ground, that neither the Tranſgreſſion of his Commiſſion, nor any thing Acted beyond the Line, where the Articles of Peace between the two Crowns did not extend, could have in a Legal Courſe of Trial ſhortned his days.

When Sir Walter was arrived at Plymouth, Sir Lewis Steuckley, Vice-Admiral of the County of Devon, ſeized him, being Commiſſioned by his Majeſty to bring him for London; which could add no Terror to a Perſon who could expect nothing leſs; and was now forced to make uſe of all the Arts imaginable to appeaſe his Majeſty, and defer his Anger. To which intent, Mannowry, a French Quack, at Salisbury gave him ſeveral Vomits, and an Artificial Compoſition, which made him look Gaſtly and Dreadful, full of Pimples and Bliſters, and put the Cheat upon the very Phyſicians themſelves, who could not tell what to make of his Urine (though often inſpected) being Adulterated with a Drug in the Glaſs, that turned it even in their very hands, into an earthy Humour of a blackiſh Colour, and of a very offenſive ſavour.

While he lay under this Politique Diſguiſe, he Penned his Declaration and Apologie, which have ſufficiently proved his honourable Deſigns in that Voyage, and anſwered the little Calumnies of his Enemies. When he was brought to London, he was permitted the Confinement of his own Houſe, but finding the Court wholly guided by Gondamor, he could hope for little Mercy; therefore he wiſely contrived the deſign of an Eſcape into France, which Sir Lewis Steuckley betrayed. But the fate of Traytors purſued him, and brought him to a contemptible End, to die a poor diſtracted Begger in the Iſle of Lindey, having for a Bag of Money falſified his faith, confirmed by the Tie of the Holy Sacrament, (if we may give Credit to Mr. Howel who hath given us this Story;) as alſo before the Year came about, to be found Clipping the ſame very Coyn in the Kings own Houſe at White-Hall, which he had received for a Reward of his Perfidiouſneſs: For which, being Condemned to be Hanged, he was forced to ſell himſelf to his Shirt, to purchaſe his Pardon of two Knights.

King James was willing to Sacrifice the Life of Sir Walter to the Advancement of Peace with Spain, but not upon ſuch Grounds as the Ambaſſador had deſign'd; for he deſired a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occaſion he might ſlily gain from the Engliſh an acknowledgment of his Maſters right in thoſe Places, and hereafter both ſtop their Mouths, and quench their Heat and Valour. Hence upon his old Condemnation (for having had experience upon a former Trial, they cared not to run the hazard of a ſecond) he was Sentenced: The old Judgment being only Averred againſt him; and from Weſtminſter-Hall he was carried ried to the Gate-House; and from thence the next Morning to the Parliament-Yard, where he had the favour of the Ax granted him. But all Persons have wondred how that old Sentence, that had lain Dormant sixteen Years and upwards against Sir Walter, could have been made use of to take off his Head afterwards: Considering the then Lord Chancellor Verulam, told him positively, (as Sir Walter was acquainting him with that Proffer of Sir William St. Geon, for a pecuniary Pardon, which might have been obtained for a less Sum, than his Guiana Preparations amounted to) in these words: "Sir, "the Knee Timber of your Voyage is Money, spare your Purse in this par-"ticular, for upon my Life, you have a sufficent Pardon for all that is passed "already, the King having under his Broad Seal made you Admiral of your "Fleet, and given you Power of the Martial Law over the Officers and "Souldiers. It was the Opinion of most Lawyers, that he, who by his Majesties Patent, had power of Life and Death over the Kings Leige People, should be esteemed or judged Rectus in Curia, and free from all old Convictions. But Sir Walter hath made the best Defence for his Guiana Actions, in his Letter to his Majesty, which I have here Inserted.

May it Please your Most Excellent Majesty,

"IF in my Journey Outward bound, I had my Men Murdered at the "Island, and yet spared to take Revenge. If I did discharge some "Spanish Barques taken, without Spoil. If I did forbear all parts of "the Spanish Indies, wherein I might have taken Twenty of their Towns, on "the Sea-Coasts, and did only follow the Enterprise I undertook for Guiana, "where without any Directions from me, a Spanish Village was Burnt, which "was new set up within three miles of the Myne; by your Majesties favour, "I find no Reason why the Spanish Ambassador should complain of me. If "it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder 26 Englishmen, binding them "back to back, and then cutting their Throats, when they had Traded with "them a whole Month, and came to them on the Land without so much as "one Sword; and that it may not be lawful for your Majesties Subjects, being "Charged first by them, to repel Force by Force; we may justly say, O "miserable English! If Parker and Metham took Campeach and other Places "in the Honduraes, seated in the heart of the Spanish Indies, burnt Towns, "killed the Spaniards, and had nothing said to them at their Return, and "my self forbore to look into the Indies because I would not Offend; I may "justly say, O miserable Sir Walter Raleigh! If I spent my poor Estate, lost "my Son, suffered by Sickness, and otherwise a world of Miseries; if I "have Resisted with the manifest hazard of my Life, the Robberies and "Spoyls which my Company would have made; if when I was Poor, I might "have made my self Rich; if when I had gotten my Liberty, which all "Men, and Nature it self do so much prise, I voluntarily lost it; if when "I was sure of my Life, I rendred it again; if I might elsewhere have sold "my Ship and Goods, and put 5 or 6000 Pound in my Pocket, and yet "brought her into England. I beseech your Majesty to believe, that all this "I have done, because it should not be said to your Majesty, that your Ma-"jesty had given Liberty and Trust, to a man whose End was but the Re-"covery of his Liberty, and who had betrayed your Majesties Trust. My "Mutineers told me, that if I returned for England, I should be undone; but "I believed in your Majesties Goodness more than in all their Arguments.

" Sure, I am, that I am the first that being Free and able to Enrich my self, " have imbraced Poverty and Peril. And as sure I am, that my Example shall " make me the last. But your Majesties Wisdom and Goodness I have made " my Judges, who have ever been, and shall ever be, your Majesties

Most Humble Vassal,

WALTER RALEIGH.

But this Apology, though never so perswasive, could not satisfie Gondamor's Rage, who was resolved to Sacrifice the only Favorite left of Queen Elizabeth, to the Spanish Interest: and who, as Osborn remarks, was the only Person of Essex's Enemies that died lamented, and the only Man left of Note alive, that had helped to Beat the Spaniard in the Year 1588.

Upon Thursday the 29*th* of October, 1618. Sir Walter Raleigh was Conveyed by the Sheriffs of London, to a Scaffold in the Old Pallace at VVestminster, where he was Executed about Nine of the Clock in the Morning of the same Day: Whose Confession and several Speeches there delivered, with his Gesture and Behaviour, were as follows.

His first appearance upon the Scaffold, was with a smiling Countenance, saluting the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen, with others of his Acquaintance there present; when after a Proclamation of Silence by an Officer appointed, he addressed himself to Speak in this manner.

I desire to be born withal, because this is the third day of my Feaver: And if I shew any weakness, I beseech you to attribute it to my Malady for this is the Hour I look for it.

Then pawsing a while, directing himself towards a Window, where the Lord of Arundel, and the Lord of Doncaster, with some other Lords and Knights sat, with a loud Voice he said as followeth.

'I thank God of his Infinite Goodness, that he hath sent me to Die in the 'sight of so Honourable an Assembly, and not in Darkness. But by reason the place where they sat, was some distance from the Scaffold, that they could not easily hear him, he said: I will strain my self, for I would willingly have your Honours hear me. The Lord of Arundel answered, We will come upon the Scaffold; where after he had Saluted every one of them severally, he began as followeth.

'As I said, I thank my God heartily, that he hath brought me into the 'Light to Die, and hath not suffered me to Die in the dark Prison of the Tow-'er, where I have suffered a great deal of Adversity, and a long Sickness; 'and I thank God that my Feaver hath not taken me at this time, as I pray'd 'God it might not.

'There are two main Points of Suspition, that his Majesty hath conceived 'against me, and wherein his Majesty cannot be satisfied, which I desire to 'Clear and Resolve you off:

'One is that his Majesty hath been informed that I have had some Plot 'with France, and his Majesty had some Reason to induce him thereunto. 'One Reason that his Majesty had to Conjecture so, was, that when I came 'back from Guiana being come to Plymouth, I endeavoured to go to Rochel; 'which was because I would fain have made my Peace before I came to Eng-'land. Another Reason was that upon my Flight, I did intend to Flie to France 'for saving of my Life, having had some Terror from above. A third 'Reason was the French Agent's coming to me, and it was Reported that I had 'Commission from the King of France.

But

'But this I ſay, for a Man to call God to Witneſs to a Falſhood at any time 'is a grievous ſin, and what ſhall he hope for at the Tribunal Day of Judg-'ment? But to call God to Witneſs to a Falſhood at the time of Death, is 'far more grievous and impious, and there is no hope for ſuch an one. And 'what ſhould I expect that am now going to render an Account of my Faith? 'I do therefore call the Lord to Witneſs, as I hope to be ſaved, and as I hope 'to ſee Him in his Kingdom, which I hope will be within this quarter of this 'Hour; I never had any Commiſſion from the King of France, nor any 'Treaty with the French Agent, nor with any from the French King; neither 'knew I that there was an Agent, or what he was, till I met him in my Gal-'lery at my Lodging unlooked for. If I ſpeak not true, O Lord, let me 'never come into thy Kingdom.

'The ſecond Suſpition was, that his Majeſty hath been Informed, that I 'ſhould ſpeak Diſhonourably and Diſloyally of him. But my Accuſer was 'a baſe Frenchman, a kind of a Chymical Fellow, one whom I knew to be Per-'fidious; for being drawn into this Action at Wincheſter in which my Hand was 'toucht, and he being ſworn to ſecrecy over Night, revealed it in the Morning.

'But in this I ſpeak now, What have I to do with Kings? I have nothing 'to do with them, neither do I fear them: I have now to do with God, there-'fore to tell a Lye now to get the Favour of the King, were in vain. There-'fore, as I hope to be ſaved at the laſt Day, I never ſpake Diſhonourably, 'Diſloyally, or Diſhoneſtly of the King; neither to this Frenchman, nor to 'any other; neither had I ever in all my Life, a thought of ill of his Maje-'ſty. Therefore I cannot but think it ſtrange, that this Frenchman being ſo 'baſe, ſo mean a Fellow, ſhould be ſo far Credited; and ſo much for this 'Point. I have dealt truly, and I hope I ſhall be believed. I confeſs, I did 'attempt to eſcape, and I did diſſemble and fain my ſelf Sick at Salisbury, but 'I hope it was no ſin. The Prophet David did make himſelf a Fool, and did 'ſuffer Spittle to fall upon his Beard to eſcape the hands of his Enemies, and 'it was not imputed to him as ſin; and I did it to prolong Time till his Ma-'jeſty came, hoping for ſome Commiſeration from him.

'I forgive this Frenchman, and Sir Lewis Steuckley, and have received the 'Sacrament this Morning of Mr. Dean, and I do alſo forgive all the World. 'But thus much I am bound in Charity to ſpeak of this Man, that all Men may 'take good heed of him: Sir Lewis Steuckley, my Kinſman and Keeper, hath 'affirmed, that I ſhould tell him, that I did tell my Lord Carew, and my Lord 'Doncaſter, of my preſent Eſcape; but I proteſt before God, I never told 'Steuckley any ſuch thing, neither did I tell my Lord Carew, or my Lord 'Doncaſter of my pretended Eſcape. It was not likely that I ſhould acquaint 'two Privy Councellors of my purpoſe; neither would I tell him, for he 'left me 6, 7, 8, 9, or 10 Days to go where I liſted, while he Rode about 'the Country.

'Again he Accuſed me, that I ſhould tell him, that my Lord Carew, and 'my Lord Doncaſter, would meet me in France, which was never my Speech 'or Thought.

'Thirdly, He Accuſed me, that I ſhew'd him a Letter, and that I ſhould 'give him 10000 Pound for my Eſcape; but caſt my Soul into everlaſting 'Fire, if I ever made him offer of 10000 Pounds, or 1000 Pounds, but meer-'ly I ſhew'd him a Letter, that if he would go with me, his Debts ſhould 'be paid when he was gone; neither had I 1000 Pound, for if I had had ſo 'much, I could have done better with it, and made my Peace otherwiſe.

'Fourthly, When I came to Sir Edward Pelham, who had been ſometimes a 'follower of mine, who gave me good Entertainment, he gave out that I had 'received ſome Dram of Poyſon in Sir Edward Pelham's Houſe; when I an- 'ſwered, that I feared no ſuch thing, for I was well aſſured of them in the 'Houſe. Now God forgive him, for I do, and I deſire God to forgive him; I 'will not only ſay God is the God of Revenge, but I deſire God to forgive 'him, as I hope to be forgiven.

Then he looked over his Note of Remembrance, 'Well, ſaith he, thus 'far have I gone, now a little more, and I will have done by and by.

'It was told the King I was brought per force into England, and that I did 'not intend to come again, whereas Captain Charles Parker, Mr. Treſham, 'Mr. Leak, and divers others, that knew how I was dealt withal, ſhall Wit- 'neſs for me; for the Common Souldiers, which were 150 Mutined, 'and ſent for me to come into the Gun-Room to them, for at that time they 'would not come to me; and there was I forced to take an Oath, that I 'would not come into England till they would have me, or elſe they would 'caſt me into the Sea and Drown me; afterwards they entred my 'Cabbin and ſet themſelves againſt me. After I had taken this Oath, with 'Wine and other things I drew the chiefeſt of them to deſiſt, and at length 'I perſwaded them to go into Ireland; then would they have gone into the 'North parts of Ireland, but I told them they were Redſhanks: But at laſt 'with much ado I perſwaded them to go into the South parts; promiſing to 'get their Pardons, but was forced to give them 125 Pound at Kinſale to bring 'them Home, otherwiſe I had never got from them.

'There was a Report that I meant not to go to Guiana at all, and that I 'knew not of any Myne, nor intended any ſuch matter, but only to get my 'Liberty, which I had not the Wit to keep. But it was my full intent to go 'for Gold, for the Benefit of his Majeſty and thoſe that went with me, with 'the reſt of my Country-Men: But he that knew the Head of the Myne 'would not Diſcover it, when he ſaw that my Son was ſlain, but made himſelf 'away. And then he turned to my Lord of Arundel, and ſaid, Being in the 'Gallery in my Ship at my Departure, your Honour took me by the Hand, 'and ſaid you would requeſt me one thing, that was, That whether I made a 'good Voyage or bad, yet I ſhould return again into England; when I made you a 'Promiſe and gave you my Faith that I would: And ſo you did (anſwered my 'Lord) it is true, they were the laſt words I ſpake unto you. Another Opinion 'was, that I carried to Sea with me 1600 Pieces, and that was all the Voy- 'age I intended, only to get Money into my hands, and that I had weighed 'my Voyage before; whereas I proteſt I had but a 100 Pound in all the 'World, whereof I gave 25 Pounds to my Wife: the reaſon of this Speech 'was this; there was entered 20000 Pound, and yet but 4000 Pound in the 'Surveyors Book, now I gave my Bill for the other 16000 Pound for divers 'Adventurers, but I proteſt I had not a Penny of Money more than 100 'Pound, as I hope to be ſaved.

'Another Slander was raiſed, that I would have gone away from them and 'left them at Guiana, but there were a great many of worthy Men that Ac- 'companied me always, as my Serjeant Major George Raleigh, and divers 'others (which he then named) that knew my intent was nothing ſo. And 'theſe be the Material Points I thought good to ſpeak of; I am now at this 'inſtant to render my Account to God, and I proteſt as I ſhall appear before 'Him, this that I have ſpoken is true.

'I will ſpeak but a word or two more, becauſe I will not trouble Mr. 'Sheriff too long.

'There was a Report ſpread, that I ſhould rejoyce at the death of my 'Lord of Eſſex, and that I ſhould take Tobacco in his preſence; when as I 'proteſt I ſhed Tears at his Death, though I was one of the contrary Faction; 'and at the time of his Death I was all the while in the Armory at the further 'end, where I could but ſee him; I was ſorry that I was not with him, for I 'heard he had a deſire to ſee me, and be Reconciled to me. So that I proteſt I 'lamented his Death, and good cauſe had I, for it was the worſe for me as it 'proved, for after he was gone I was little beloved.

'And now I intreat you all to joyn with me in Prayer, that the Great God 'of Heaven, whom I have grievouſly offended, being a Man full of all Va- 'nity, and have lived a ſinful Life, in all ſinful Callings, having been a Soul- 'dier, a Captain, a Sea-Captain, and a Courtier, which are all places of 'Wickedneſs and Vice; that God (I ſay) would forgive me, and caſt away 'my Sins from me, and that he would receive me into everlaſting Life. So 'I take my leave of you all, making my Peace with God.

Then Proclamation being made that all Men ſhould depart the Scaffold, he prepared himſelf for Death, giving away his Hat and wrought Night-cap, and ſome Money to ſuch as he knew that ſtood near him: Taking his leave of the Lords, Knights, and other Gentlemen, and among the reſt taking his leave of the Lord of Arundel, he thanked him for his Company, and intreated him to deſire the King, that no Scandalous Writing to Defame him might be Publiſhed after his Death; ſaying further unto him, I have a long Journey to go, and therefore will take my leave.

Then putting off his Gown and Doublet, he called to the Headſman to ſhew him the Ax, which being not preſently ſhew'd him, he ſaid, I pray thee let me ſee it, Doſt thou think that I am afraid of it? And having it in his hands, he felt along upon the Edge of it, and ſmiling, ſpake to the Sheriff, ſaying, This is a ſharp Medicine, but it is a Phyſitian for all Diſeaſes. Then going to and fro upon the Scaffold, on every ſide he pray'd the Company to pray to God to aſſiſt him and ſtrengthen him.

And ſo being asked which way he would lay himſelf, on which ſide the Block, as he ſtretched himſelf along and laid his Head on the Block, he ſaid, So the Heart be right, it is no matter which way the Head lieth. And then Praying after he had forgiven the Headſman, having given him a Sign when he ſhould do his Office, at two blows he loſt both Head and Life, his Body never ſhrinking nor moving. His Head was ſhewed on each ſide of the Scaffold, and then put into a Red-Leather Bag, and his wrought Velvet Gown thrown over it, which was afterwards conveyed away in a Mourning Coach of his Ladies.

The large Effuſion of Blood, which proceeded from his Veins, amaz'd the Spectators, who Conjectured he had ſtock enough left of Nature, to have Surviv'd many Years, though now near Fourſcore Years old. He behav'd himſelf at his Death, with ſo High and ſo Religious a Reſolution, as if a Chriſtian had Acted a Roman, or rather a Roman a Chriſtian: And by the Magnanimity, which was then Conſpicuous in him, he abundantly Baffled their Calumnies, who had Accuſed him of Atheiſm. Various were the Reſentments of his Death, and ſeveral Paſquils (as it always happens on ſuch Occaſions) were ſcatter'd abroad. Of the Gallantry of his Behaviour on the Scaffold, theſe following Verſes may give a Confirmation, and a Taſte of the Poetry of thoſe Times.

One of ſuch incomparable Policy, that he was too hard for Eſſex, was the Envy of Leiceſter, and Cecils Rival, who grew jealous of his Excellent Parts, and was afraid of being ſupplanted by Him. CHAP. I.

Of the Creation and Preservation of the World.

SECT. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the Wisest Men acknowledg to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which it self can only comprehend; an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: In the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that Glory which cannot be measured; and withal, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven we perceive a shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful Provision for all that live, his manifold Goodness: And lastly, In creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightiness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestial and Terrestrial Bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent Effects, we approach to the knowledg of the omnipotent Cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more than wonderful Works, God (saith * Hugo) speaketh unto Man: And it is true, That these be those Discourses of God, whose Effects, those that live, witness in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible Natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable Souls: For, according to † S. Gregory, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet; Every Man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all Men behold, (saith Job) which is, according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in Creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his Creatures. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of St. John and St. Paul, Ye have not heard his Voice at any time, neither have ye seen his Shape. And again, Whom never Man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of God's simplicity; of which St. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That Nature, or that Substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this Opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, Hierom, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of Authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of Men; which is also the understood Language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphical Characters are the unnumbred Stars, the Sun, and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament; written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the Letters of all those living Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The World universal is nothing else but God express. And the invisible Things of God (saith St. Paul) are seen by the Creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other Cause preceding than his own Will, no other Matter than his own Power, no other Workman than his own Word, no other Consideration than his own infinite Goodness. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own Love; so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his high Wisdom disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex Fide, & ex Effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the Effects of the World's Creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæque fiunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei Verbo: For he of whom there is no higher Cause, cannot be known by any knowledg of Cause or Beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the Word of God himself. *A. SECT. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

THis Work and Creation of the World did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledg, though by divers terms, and in a different manner express; I mean all those who are intitled by St. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest Judgment and Understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium Universorum, The Original of the Universal; to whom he giveth also the Attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truly with St. Paul, casteth upon God all Power; confessing also, That the World was made by God's Almighty Word, and not by Hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est Mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in Opinion) took the word Fire to express God by, (as in Deuteronomy, and in St. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno Igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one Fire. Herm. in Pœmandro, & in sermone sacro. Deut 4. 24 Heb. 12. 29.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, That the World had beginning in time, from the Will of the most high God, whose remarkable words are thus converted; Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter Summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex Sacro Corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense; When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his Sacred Heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable Works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator Summus. Plato calleth God the Cause and Original, the Nature and Reason of the Universal; Totius Rerum Natura, Causa, & Origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter. Vid. cap. 8.

Now, although the curiosity of some Men have found it superfluous to remember the Opinions of Philosophers in Matters of Divinity (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any forreign Testimony): yet as the Fathers, with others excellently Learned, are my Examples herein; so Saint Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the Word of God among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not: as in the Epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventh of the Acts, Aratus, &c. For, Truth (saith St. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the Holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunque dicatur, à Spiritu Sancto est: And lastly, Let those kind of Men learn this Rule; Quæ sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of Holy Things.

SECT.

SECT. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Gen. I. 1.

THis visible World, of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden Mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some Men have conceived, both which are subsequent; but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary Matter to be informed, nor Form to inform, nor any Being, but the Eternal. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: For if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power than that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency? for it is an act of more excellency to make, than to dispose of things made. Whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we fain a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both Infinite; the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile est plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot be more Infinities than one; for one of them would limit the other.

Cusan. de Mente. l. 3.

SECT. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genes. 2. 1.

THe Universal Matter of the World (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood; for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first Matter, as the Peripateticks understand it; to which St. Augustine and Isidore seem to adhere, Feciſti mundum (saith St. Augustine) de materiâ informi; quam feciſti de nullâ re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou hast made the World of a Matter without Form; which matter thou madest of Nothing; and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginary Materia Prima cannot exist without Form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirm, That it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven; which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Eugubynus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: An Error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius; though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the Seat of Angels and just Souls, than in the former affirmation; for of the first, That God liveth in Eternal Light, it is written, My Soul, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himself with Light: And in the Revelation; And the City hath no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon to shine in it; for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer upon Genesis differeth not in Opinion from Eugubynus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or super-celestial; so in his judgment, because it was in all eternity the glorious Seat of God himself, it was not necessary to be created; Quem Mundum Super-cœlestem meo judicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

Pſ. 103. 12. Christus divina non est lux facta, sed sapientia Dei, non creata, sed nata, Apoc 21. 23. Mercer. in Gen. 7. 7.

But as Moses forbare to speak of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the weakness of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of those things which were most manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their Forefathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceiveable Universal: so on the other side I dare not think, that any superceleſtial Heaven, or whatsoever else (not himself) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the World created, the finite Wisdom of mortal Men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the Seat of infinite Power, no more than infinite Power it self can be limited; for his place is in himself, whom no magnitude else can contain. How great is the House of God? (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his Possession? It is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

Bar. 3. 24, 25.

But leaving multiplicity of Opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid Matter and Substance, as well of all the Heavens and Orbs supernal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the Seed of the Universal: An Opinion of antient Philosophers long before.

SECT. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the Body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the Attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the antient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting Waters but in the third place) as comprehending Waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Mass, and (as Basil saith) Præparare naturam Aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; To prepare the nature of Water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all Heavenly Bodies and Natures expresst; and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt Seeds bring forth corrupt Plants; to which the pure Heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish, (saith David) and the Heavens shall vanish away like Smoak, saith Esay. Neither were the Waters the Matter of Earth; for it is written, Let the Waters under the Heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry Land appear: which proveth, that the dry Land was mixt and covered with the Waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the Waters were the Matter or Seed of the Earth, much less of the Universal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundâsti; Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: And again, The Earth was covered with the Deep (meaning with Waters) as with a Garment, saith David. And if by natural Arguments it may be proved, that Water by condensation may become Earth; the same reason teacheth us also, that Earth rarified may become Water; Water, Air; Air, Fire; and so on the contrary.

Zeno. Deus Ignis substantiam per Aërem in Aquam convertit; God turneth the substance of Fire by Air into Water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state in which they were created, as touching their Substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of Beauty and Or-

For (according to Mon-

This Mass, or indigested Matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without Form, that is, without the proper Form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the Wa-

Gen. 1. 2. ters. And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any Creatures, or adorned with any Plants, Fruits, or Flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the Waters, and wrought this indigested Matter into that Form which it now retaineth, then did the Earth bud forth the Herb, which seedeth Seed, and the fruitful Tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which Attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect; for Perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et Perfecti Dei perfecta sunt Opera; The Works of the Perfect God are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the antient Poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: Of which Ovid;

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide,
In all the World one only face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heap.——

SECT. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without Form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat (saith Hieronus) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cujusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil:) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatum est ab avibus pullitiei suæ incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of Birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Basil Hexam. Junius.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: The Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus à conspectu Dei sufflabat: or, as other understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The Wind from the Face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Psalm, He caused his Wind to blow, and the Waters increase: but there was yet no Wind nor Exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Maracheset, id est, efficaciter motitans, confovens, ac agitans super faciem gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double Liquor. For he maketh four Originals, whereof three are Agents, and the last Passive and Material, to wit, Causa, which is the Divine Goodness: Jehi, which is, fiat, sive erit, Let it be, or, It shall be. Quæ Vox Verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which Voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac præsens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, A certain Divine Power, or strength every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am resolved, (Cum Deus sit super rationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the Effects which follow his wonderful ways of working, may in a measure be perceived by Man's Understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his Divine Power, cannot be conceived by any Mind, or Spirit, compassed with a mortal Body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways. And as the World hath not known God himself; so are his Ways (according to St. Paul) past finding out. O Righteous Father, the World hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that Motion, Vitality, and Operation, were by Incubation or how else, the manner is only known to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith St. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by Essence, Presence, or Power, our Understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference between God and Man, if Man's Understanding could conceive the Counsels and disposings of that Eternal Majesty: And therefore to be overcurious in searching how the All-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his All-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave Form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their Depths: for so doth the one lose his Life, and the other his Understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his Light, as long as we look towards it but tenderly and circumspectly: we warm our ſelves ſafely while we ſtand neer the Fire; but if we ſeek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eſchew curioſity; this is true, That the Engliſh word (moved) is moſt proper and ſignificant: for of Motion proceedeth all Production, and all whatſoever is effected. And this Omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis cauſæ efficientis, The force of the efficient Cauſe, St. Auguſtine ſometimes taketh for the Holy Ghoſt; ſometimes for a Wind or Breath; Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is ſometimes ſo taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it alſo a Breath or Wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Toſtatus, Voluntatem & Mentem Dei, The Will and Mind of God: which Mens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam Mundi, The Soul of the World: And in his ſixth Book, de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epiſtles, The Leader of Things to come, and the Preſence of things paſt. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Chriſt our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox ſilet, & non mea tantùm, ſed etiam Angelorum; My Mind faileth, my Voice is ſilent, and not mine only, but even the Voice of Angels: So may all Men elſe ſay in the underſtanding and utterance of the Ways and Works of the Creation; for to him (ſaith Nazianzenus) there is not one ſubſtance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed conſubſtantiale illi eſt, quicquid ejus eſt, & quicquid eſt; Whatſoever attribute of him there is, and whatſoever he is, it is the very ſame ſubſtance that himſelf is.

Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the Waters, cannot be taken for a Breath or Wind, nor for any other Creature, ſeparate from the infinite active Power of God, which then formed and diſtinguiſhed, and which now ſuſtaineth and giveth continuance to the Univerſal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the World; and the ſame is it which maintaineth all things, ſaith Solomon. If thou ſend forth thy Spirit (ſaith David) they are created. And Gregory, Deus ſuo præſentiali eſſe, dat omnibus rebus eſſe, ita quòd ſi ſe rebus ſubtraheret, ſicut de nihilo facta ſunt omnia, ſic in nihilum defluerent univerſa; God giveth being to all things, by being preſent with all things, ſo as if he ſhould withdraw himſelf from them, then as of nothing the World was made, it would again fall away and vaniſh into nothing. And this working of God's Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expreſt excellently.

Spiritus intus alit: totamq; infuſa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno ſe corpore miſcet.

The Heaven, and Earth, and all the Liquid Mayn,
The Moon's bright Globe, and Stars Titanian,
A Spirit within maintains: and their whole Maſs,
A mind, which through each part infus'd doth paſs,
Faſhions, and Works, and wholly doth tranſpierce
All this great Body of the Univerſe.

And this was the ſame Spirit which moved in the Univerſal, and thereby both diſtinguiſhed and adorned it. His Spirit hath garniſhed the Heavens, ſaith Job. So God moved upon the Waters, and created in them their ſpirituality, and natural Motion; Motion brought forth Heat; and Heat Rarifaction, and ſubtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby operation to every Nature, while it moved upon the Waters, which were in one indigeſted Lump and Chaos, diſpoſed to all Forms alike) was begotten Air; an Element ſuperior, as lighter than the Waters; through whoſe vaſt, open, ſubtile, Diaphanick, or tranſparent Body, the Light, afterwards created, might eaſily tranſpierce: Light for the excellency thereof being the firſt Creature which God called good, whoſe creation immediately followed. The Spirit Chryſoſtom calleth a Vital Operation, Aquis à Deo inſitam, ex qua Aquæ non ſolum motionem, ſed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A Vital Operation given by God unto the Waters, whereby the Waters had not only Motion, but alſo Power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

SECT. VII.

Of the Light created, as the material ſubſtance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledg of it: and of the excellency and uſe of it: and of Motion and Heat annexed unto it.

THeſe Waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: And this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Inſtrument of Created Light. For this firſt and diſperſed Light did not (as I conceive) diſtinguiſh the Night from the Day, but with a reference to the Sun's Creation, and the uniting of the diſperſed Light therein. This is proved by theſe words, Let there be Lights in the Firmament, to ſeparate the Day from the Night: which Lights in the Firmament of Heaven were alſo made for Signs, and for Seaſons, and for Days, and for Years, implying a motion inſtantly to follow, by which Days and Years are diſtinguiſhed; after which ſucceeded Time, or together with which that Time (which was the meaſure of Motion) began. For that ſpace of the firſt three days which preceded the Sun's creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any Motion to be meaſured; and the Day named in the fifth Verſe, was but ſuch a ſpace, as afterwards by the Sun's motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the Matter of Air, of the Firmament, and of the lower and upper Waters, and of the Seas and Creatures therein; Earth, the matter of Beaſts, Plants, Minerals, and Man's Body: So may Light (for expreſſion-ſake) be called the Chaos, or material Subſtance of the Sun, and other Lights of Heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing ſenſible is that Light it ſelf, Quæ cauſa eſt lucidorum, Which is the cauſe that things are lightſome, (though it make it ſelf and all things elſe viſible:) but a Body moſt illightned, which illumineth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the ſuppoſed Element of Fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all Bodies living in this our Air. For this Light Avicenna calleth, Vehiculum & fomentum omnium Cæleſtium virtutum, & impreſſionum: The Conducter, and Preſerver and Nouriſher of all Cæleſtial Virtues and Impreſſions; nothing deſcending of Heavenly Influences, but by the medium, or means of Light. Ariſtotle Aristotle calleth Light a quality inherent or cleaving to a Diaphanous Body, Lumen est qualitas inhærens Diaphano: But this may be better avouched of the Heat, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which Heat (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subjecto; The Light being departed, doth reside in the Subject; as warmth in the Air, though the same be deprived of light. This Light Plotinus and all the Academicks make incorporeal; and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Ficin. lib. lumine, cap. 11.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the Beams of Light; but it is but by way of repetition of other Mens Opinions, saith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to Light it self, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it passeth through the solid Body of Glass, or other Crystalline Matter; and whereas it is withstood by unclean and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more easie to invade than the former, the same is, Quòd obstaculum naturâ terreum atq; sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure clearness of Light: alluding to that most Divine Light, which only shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross and humane uncleanness.

Plotin.

But of this created Light, there is no agreement in Opinion; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or School-men, or other antient or later Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: all Men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no Man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas, (not inferior to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of Argument in refuting the Opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his own judgment herein as weak as any Man's; and most of the School-men were rather curious in the nature of Terms, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of Doctrine already laid down, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: Of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientiæ odiosius acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true Wisdom, than too acute sharpness. Neither hath the length of Time, and the search of many Learned Men, (which the same time hath brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this Light be substantial, corporal, or incorporal: Corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the Air, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous Bodies, which it doth; and yet every day we see the Air illightned: Incorporal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the Eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be Matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the Subject: For light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in existence. Secondly, If Light were proceeding from Matter and Form, then either or both must be one of these, * Lucid or Bright, Dark or Opake, Diaphanous or Transparent; but Darkness cannot be parent of Light; and things Diaphanous (being neither Light nor Darkness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the Matter, or Form, or both, be lucid and shining. Lucid and shining obtain their so being of the Light; and therefore if we derive this being of Light from a former, then would the progress go on infinitely and against Nature; and therefore he concludeth, that Light in the Sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it self, and is therefore the Sun's form, and the form of all lucid and shining Bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

* Lucida corpora sunt plena suæ luce alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris alieno lumine. Transparentia seu Diaphana carent suis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. sub. ex 71.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be englished by Light; and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other Lights of Heaven, or from any other Light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or green Glass: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which redness or other colour, we call the Intentional Species of the colour in that Glass. And again, as this Light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is disputed, whether this Light first created be the same which the Sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Sun's creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the Works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the Universal: First, As they were created in Matter; secondly, as they were adorned with Form: First, Naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry Land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, was Earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry Land; and the Waters were Waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their virtual Forms: So the Sun, although it had not its formal perfection, his Circle, Beauty, and bounded Magnitude, till the fourth day; yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated and had obtained life and Motion. Neither did the wisdom of God find cause why it should move (by which motion days and nights are distinguished) till then: Because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give Light, Heat, and Operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the Bud of the Herb, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferiour World; by his heat to stir up the fire of Generation, and to give activity to the Seeds of all Natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved; and approving it, disposed thereof to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

Quemadmodum Rex aliquis, &c. Procop. in Gen. 1.

But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the Light parted? and where is the way where Light dwelleth? We thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under Man's understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by God's Grace we enjoy the Effects thereof. For this Light is of the Treasure of God (saith Esdras) : And those which inhabit the Heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in Cœlo, nihil notum in Terra; Nothing unknown in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on Earth. Res veræ sunt in Mundo invisibili; in Mundo visibile Umbræ rerum; Things themselves are in the invisible World; in the World visible, but their Shadows. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure : for howsoever, it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministreth unto Men, and other Creatures, all Celestial Influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth unto us the glorious Works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical swiftness our Eyes unto Heaven, that by the sight thereof, our Minds being informed of his visible Marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to find out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cætera Mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cùm suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (saith St. Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the World so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which, Ovid out of Orpheus :

Ovid. Met. lib. 1.

The World discerns it self, while I the World behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the World's Eye.

Lastly, If we may behold in any Creature any one spark of that Eternal Fire, or any far-off dawning of God's glorious Brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux Ipsa; and the Light, by Hermes, named Lux Sancta; and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light which lighteth every Man that cometh into the World. Yet in respect of God's incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a Mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a Light, such as can be discerned. Deus profectò non Mens est, at verò ut sit Mens causa est; nec Spiritus, sed causa quâ Spiritus extat; nec Lumen, sed causa quâ Lumen existet : God (saith Hermes in Pœmandro) certainly is not a Mind, but the cause that the Mind hath its being; nor Spirit, but the cause by which every Spirit is; nor Light, but the cause by which the Light existeth.

Joh. 1. 9. & 14. 46.

So then the Mass and Chaos being first created void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and Motion, resolved their thinner parts into Air, which God illightned : the Earth also by being contiguat, and mixt with Waters (participating of the same Divine Virtue) brought forth the Bud of the Herb that seedeth Seed, &c. And for a Mean and Organ, by which this operative Virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also Motion and Heat; which Heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

SECT. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament : And whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the Waters, and Light was created; God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the Waters, and let it separate the Waters from the Waters : that is, those Waters which by rarefaction and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these Waters separate above this Extension, which the Latin Translation calleth Firmamentum, or Expansum, (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turn it) are not the Crystalline Heavens created in the imaginations of Men; which Opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned Arguments against this Infancy. For the Waters above the Firmament are the Waters in the Air above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the nether Waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space; the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh) and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the Heaven and for Air, and more properly for the Air and Æther, than for the Heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infimis crassis diducta, intersectaque distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thin Bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters : and the waters above the Firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that Tongue taken properly for the Waters above the Air, or in the uppermost Region of the same.

Mon. Nat. hist. fol. 152.

And that the Word Heaven is used for the Air, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the blessings of Joseph, and in the 104. Psalm : * By these Springs shall the Fowl of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained Brimstone and Fire out of the Heaven : and in Isaac's Blessing to Jacob; God give thee therefore of the Dew of Heaven : And in Deuteronomy the 11. But the Land whither you go to possess it, is a Land that drinketh Water of the Rain of Heaven : And in Job, Who hath ingendred the Frosts of Heaven? And in St. Matthew, Behold the Fowls of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout is the word Heaven very oft used for Air, and taken also hyperbolically for any great Height; as, Let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude : his own words be these; Et vocavit Deus Firmamentum Cœlum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the Firmament Heaven : This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applyed to another, (that is, to the Starry Heaven); but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the Waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Air, and not the Heaven, the words of Moses in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentitwentieth Verse, make it manifest: For in the eighth Verse it is written, That God called the Firmament, which divided Waters from Waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth Verse, he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Air, in these words, And let the Fowl flie upon the Earth in the open Firmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this Icy, or Crystalline, or Watery Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the Heat, which the Primum Mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatness of Circle, whereby the swiftness of that first Moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; But no Man ought to be held to impossibilities: And Faith it self (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conductor the Word of Truth, which also may be called Lumen omnis Rationis & Intellectus; the Light of all Reason and Understanding. Now that this supposed first Moveable turneth it self so many hundred thousand miles in an instant, (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe Mens Imagination, apprehend it; for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction search Orontius: And of this Watery Heaven, Basilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41, &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his second Book and sixth Chapter. For my self, I am perswaded, that the Waters, called The Waters above the Heavens, are but the Clouds and Waters engendred in the uppermost Air.

SECT. IX.

A Conclusion, repeating the sum of the Works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of Matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

TO conclude; It may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other Nature, or Being, but God's incomprehensible Eternity. First, He created the Matter of all things; and in the first three days he distinguished, and gave to every Nature his proper Form; the form of Levity to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of Gravity: For he separated Light from Darkness, divided Waters from Waters, and gathered the Waters under the Firmament into one place. In the last three days, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: He set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Stars; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Air with Fowl, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life, a Power Generative, thereby to continue their Species, and Kinds; to Creatures Vegetative and growing, their Seeds in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their Being: and the Generations of the World are preserved.

Wisd. Sol. cap. 14.

SECT. X.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Form, the giver of Being: And of our Ignorance, how second Causes should have any proportion with their Effects.

AND for this working-power, which we call Nature, the beginning of Motion and Rest, according to Aristotle; the same is nothing else but the Strength and Faculty which God hath infused into every Creature, having no other self-ability than a Clock, after it is wownd up by a Man's hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this Faculty any first or sole Power, have therein no other understanding, than such a one hath, who looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helm and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the piece of Wood, without all consideration of the Hand that guides it, or of the Judgment which also directeth and commandeth that Hand: forgetting in this and in all else, That by the virtue of the first Act, all Agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: For as the Mind of Man seeth by the Organ of the Eye, heareth by the Ears, and maketh choice by the Will: and therefore we attribute sight to the Eye, and hearing to the Ears, &c. and yet it is the Mind only that giveth Ability, Life, and Motion to all these his Instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Stars, by Nature or infused Properties, and by Men as by several Organs, several Effects; all second Causes whatsoever, being but Instruments, Conduits, and Pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the Head and Fountain of the Universal. For as it is God's infinite Power, and everywhere-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up Vapours to be made Clouds; Clouds to contain Rain, and Rain to fall: So all second and instrumental Causes together with Nature it self, without that operative Faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtueless, and dead: of which excellently Orpheus; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthful green. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable Virtues which God hath given to his Creatures, animate and inanimate, to Heavenly and Earthly Bodies, &c. for all his Works in their virtues praise him: But of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I say, There is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or express it, ever enrich his own understanding with any certain Truth, or ever edifie others (not foolish by self-flattery) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the Wisdom of the Philosophers), Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa; cùm verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this study (saith he) were means to find out the Truth, it had ere this been found out: But seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many Wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no Wisdom there to be had. Nam si de unâ re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessariò haberetur: If the precise knowledg of any one thing were to be had, it should necessa-

necessarily follow, that the knowledg of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working; So were they more curious than knowing in their first Matter and Physical Form. For if their first Matter had any being, it were not then the first Matter: for, as it is the first Matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not been taught, neither are these forms (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subjectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the Form, it is hard to conceive: for to make Form, which is the Cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused, (to wit, to the first Matter) is contrary to all Reason, Divine and Humane: only it may be said, that Originally there is no other difference between Matter and Form, than between Heat and Fire; of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain Scholastical distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternity of the World, I think it far safer to affirm with St. Augustine, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom whatsoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soever; from whence are the Seeds of all Forms, and the Forms of all Seeds and their Motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujuscunq; generis est, cujuscunq; æstimationis est; à quo sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confess. For all Forms (saith he) are, in primo motore; which is also the Opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.

SECT. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Stars have great influence: And that their Operations may diversly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destiny, of which the Opinions of those learned Men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastned an inevitable necessity, and made it more general, and universally powerful than it is, by giving it dominion over the Mind of Man, and over his Will; of which Ovid and Juvenal:

Juven. Sat. 7. 201.

Servis regna dabunt, captivis Fata triumphos.

'Gainst Fate no counsel can prevail.
Kingdoms to Slaves by Destinie,
To Captives triumphs given be.

Basil. Esa. 4. Aug. de heres. 70. c. 35. Tho. cont. Gent. 3. cap. 8. 3. Ficin. in 12. de leg. Cic. de fat.

An Error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as * Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the Acts of Celestial Orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour Bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational Mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolomy, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God, (quod de unoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Stars are Instruments of a far greater use, than to give an obscure Light, and for Men to gaze on after Sun-set: it being manifest, that the diversity of Seasons, the Winters and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertained by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the same course; but that the Stars have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given Virtues to Springs and Fountains, to cold Earth, to Plants and Stones, Minerals, and to the excremental parts of the basest living Creatures, why should we rob the beautiful Stars of their working Powers? For seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treasury of his Wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Star) a peculiar Virtue and Operation; as every Herb, Plant, Fruit, and Flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the Earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dusty Face, but otherwise for the use of Man and Beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious Bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end than to adorn it; but for Instruments and Organs of his Divine Providence, so far as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Stars are not Causes, (meaning perchance binding Causes); but are as open Books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the Eyes of Humane Wisdom: Which latter part I believe well, and this saying of Syracides withal; That there are hid yet greater things than these be, and we have seen but a few of his Works. And though, for the capacity of Men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost virtues of Herbs and Plants, which our selves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of Celestial Bodies. For hardly (saith Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: Who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum est de rebus Cœlestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of Heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen we do not bind God to his Creatures, in this supposed necessity of Destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful Creatures of their Powers and Offices. For had any of these second Causes despoiled God of his Prerogative, or had God himself constrained the Mind and Will of Man to impious Acts by any Celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were justifiable; of whom St. Augustine, Impia perversitate in malis factis rectissimè reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius Auctorem Syderum, quàm commissorem scelerum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverseness urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, than the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the Stars and other Celeſtial Bodies incline the Will by mediation of the ſenſitive Appetite, which is alſo ſtirred by the conſtitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted; Corpora Cœleſtia (ſaith Damaſcene) conſtituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & diſpoſitiones; The Heavenly Bodies (ſaith he) make in us habits, complexions, and diſpoſitions: For the Body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the Mind, eſpecially Bodies ſtrong in Humour, and weak in Virtues; for thoſe of cholerick Complexions are ſubject to anger, and the furious effects thereof, by which they ſuffer themſelves to be tranſported; where the Mind hath not reaſon to remember, that Paſſions ought to be her Vaſſals, not her Maſters. And that they wholly direct the reaſonleſs Mind, I am reſolved: For all thoſe which were created mortal, as Birds, Beaſts, and the like, are left to their natural Appetites; over all which, Celeſtial Bodies (as Inſtruments and Executioners of God's Providence) have abſolute dominion. What we ſhould judge of Men, who little differ from Beaſts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth againſt thoſe inforcements, may eaſily maſter or reſiſt them; ſo whoſoever ſhall neglect the Remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himſelf altogether under the power of his ſenſual appetite; Vincitur fatum ſi reſiſtas, vincit ſi contempſeris; Fate will be overcome, if thou reſiſt it; if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the Minds of Men immediately, it is abſurd to think, other than as aforeſaid, as the ſame by the Body's temper may be effected. Lumen ſolis ad generationem ſenſibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipſam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit; The Light of the Sun (ſaith St. Auguſtine) helpeth the generation of the ſenſible Bodies, moveth them to life, and nouriſheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: Yet ſtill as a Miniſter, not as a Maſter: Bonus quidem eſt Sol, in miniſterio, non imperio; The Sun is good to ſerve, not to ſway, (ſaith St. Ambroſe). And St. Auguſtine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per ſuperiora; God ruleth the Bodies below by thoſe above; But he avoucheth not, that ſuperiour Bodies have rule over Mens Minds, which are incorporal.

Hex. lib. 4. de term. 3.

But howſoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the ſame, and weaken their Operation; and Ariſtotle himſelf confeſſeth, that the Heavens do not always work their Effects in inferiour Bodies, no more than the ſigns of Rain and Wind do always come to paſs. And it is divers times ſeen, that paternal Virtue and Vice hath his counterworking to theſe Inclinations. Eſt in Juvencis Patrum virtus; In the young Off-ſpring the Father's Virtue is; and ſo the contrary, Patrum vitia: And herein alſo there is often found an enterchange; the Sons of virtuous Men by an ill conſtellation become inclinable to Vice, and of vicious Men to Virtue.

Hor. lib. 4. Od. 30.

Egregia eſt ſoboles ſcelerato nata Parente:

A worthy Son is born of a wicked Father.

But there is nothing (after God's reſerved power) that ſo much ſetteth this Art of Influence out of ſquare and rule, as Education doth: For there are none in the World ſo wickedly inclined, but that a religious inſtruction and bringing up may faſhion anew and reform; nor any ſo well diſpoſed, whom (the Reins being let looſe) the continual fellowſhip and familiarity, and the examples of diſſolute Men, may not corrupt and deform. Veſſels will ever retain a ſavour of their firſt Liquor: it being equally difficult, either to cleanſe the mind once corrupted, or to extinguiſh the ſweet ſavour of virtue firſt received, when the Mind was yet tender, open, and eaſily ſeaſoned; but where a favourable Conſtellation, (allowing that the Stars incline the Will) and a virtuous Education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both; thereby it is that Men are found ſo exceeding virtuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: For as the Seeds of Virtue may by the art and husbandry of Chriſtian Counſel produce better and more beautiful Fruit, than the ſtrength of Self-nature and Kind could have yielded them; ſo the Plants apt to grow wild, and to change themſelves into Weeds, by being ſet in a Soil ſutable, and like themſelves, are made more unſavoury, and filled with Poyſon. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus Aſtrorum, quemadmodum Agricola Terræ naturam; A wiſe Man aſſiſteth the work of the Stars, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the Soil. And Ptolomy himſelf confeſſeth thus much, Sapiens, & omina ſapientis Medici, dominabuntur Aſtris; A wiſe Man, and the ominous Art of a wiſe Phyſician ſhall prevail againſt the Stars. Laſtly, We ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the reſt of the Univerſal; whoſe Influences may be called his reſerved and unwritten Laws. But let us conſider how they bind: even as the Laws of Men do; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Laws decreed, That a Thief and a Murderer ſhall ſuffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magiſtrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet theſe Laws do not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compaſſion, or bind them without prerogative, to ſuch a ſevere execution, as that there ſhould be nothing left of liberty to Judgment, Power, or Conſcience: The Law in its own Nature, being no other than a deaf Tyrant. But ſeeing that it is otherwiſe, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do ſometimes, for cauſes to themſelves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both againſt others and themſelves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himſelf, which his Subſtitutes enjoy; God being Mercy, Goodneſs, and Charity it ſelf. Otherwiſe that Example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil; had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own Creatures truly) hath aſſured us, that there is no inclination or temptation ſo forcible, which our humble Prayers and Deſires may not fruſtrate and break aſunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Deſtiny, though depending upon eternal Power, yet being once ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himſelf ſhould in a kind have ſhut up himſelf therein; How miſerable then were the condition of Men (ſaith St. Auguſtine) left altogether without hope.

Mat. 6. 13.

And if this ſtrength of the Stars were ſo tranſferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his Creatures; be he Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be deſpoiled of all Worſhip, Reverence, or Reſpect.

Joh. 17. 4.

And certainly, God which hath promiſed us the reward of well-doing, which Chriſt himſelf claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finiſhed the Work which thou gaveſt me to do:) and the ſame God, who hath threatned unto us the ſorrow and torment of Offences, Offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or Influences of the Stars, or subject our Souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less than their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious Creatures of God virtueless: So I think that we derogate from his eternal and absolute Power and Providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion over our immortal Souls, which they have over all bodily Substances, and perishable Natures: for the Souls of Men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that Divine Light it self, whereof the Sun's clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a Shadow; Lumen est Umbra Dei, Deus est Lumen Luminis; Light is the Shadow of God's brightness, who is the Light of Light: But to end this Question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predestination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every Man hath not observed it, though all learned Men have.

SECT. XII.

Of Prescience.

PRescience, or Fore-knowledg (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in Order and Nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of Men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other than an infallible Fore-knowledg. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: Neither doth God's fore-knowledg impose any necessity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will Rise and Set; that all Men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Summer and Harvest; and that according to the several Seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of Grain; yet is not our fore-knowledg the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledg in us bind or constrain the Sun to Rise and Set, or Men to die; for the causes (as Men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of Man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a Beast is an Horse; it seeth Men, Trees, and Houses, &c. But our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own Natures. And again out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of Good, nor punishment of Evil.

SECT. XIII.

Of Providence.

NOw Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledg, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith St. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the Past; Knowledg of the Present; and Care of the Future: And we our selves account such a Man for provident, as remembring things past, and observing things present, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us hereof; and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned Men acknowledg the Providence of God; yea, the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent Diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving Providence are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place; Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with Clouds, and prepareth Rain for the Earth, and maketh the Grass to grow upon the Mountains; which giveth the Beasts their Food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them Food in due season: And thou shalt drink of the River Cherith (saith God to Eliah) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold the Fowls of the Air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. Again, Are not two Sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: Yea, all the hairs of your head are numbred. And St. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. And his Judgments are written, saith David.

God therefore, who is every-where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the Righteous, and his Countenance against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called Oculus infinitus, an infinite Eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his Power to any other; for it is contrary to his own Word, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo; I will not give my glory to another. No Man commandeth in the King's presence, but by the King's direction; but God is every-where present, and King of Kings. The example of God's Universal Providence is seen in his Creatures. The Father provideth for his Children: Beasts and Birds, and all Livings, for their young Ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universal: and if there be a natural loving care in Men and Beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this Nature, and whose Divine Love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universal: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum Universi (saith Plato): Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, Mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universæ machinæ fundamentum; The Love of God is the perpetual Knot, and Link, or Chain of the World, and the immovable Pillar of every part thereof, and the Basis and Foundation of the Universal. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustain all; so, as to absolute Power, to every-where-Presence, to perfect Goodness, to pure and divine Love, this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is only proper and belonging.

SECT. XIV.

Of Predestination.

NOw for Predestination, we can difference it no otherwise from Providence and Prescience, than in this, That Prescience only fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all Creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven, to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: And Predestination (as it is used specially by Divines) is only of Men: and yet not of all to Men belonging, but of their Salvation properly, in the common use of Divines; or Perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: Among whom St. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God; but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devil: for according to Nonius Marcellus, Destinare, est præparare: and of the same Opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Calvin, Beza, Bucanus, Danæus, and such like. And as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some Vessels of Honour, and some of Dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the Actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again, with St. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

SECT. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

LAstly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to God's Providence; and seeing that the Stars have no other Dominion than is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum; The Art, or artificial Organ of God: And Cusanus, Divini præcepti Instrumentum; The Instrument of the Divine Precept: We may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of Fools, called Fortune or Chance; a Goddess, the most reverenced, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: For Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greeks call her Τυχὼ, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homer's time this great Lady was scarce heard of: and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things; resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the success prosperous: insomuch as the actions of Men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in Men's lives, but her pastimes: of which Palladius, Vita Hominum ludus Fortunæ est, The life of Man is the play of Fortune: And because it often falleth out, that Enterprises guided by ill Counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience; whereof Athenæus:

Sen. ep. 91. Aur. Vict. de Pertinace. Sen. ep. 74. Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is said to have used to cry out upon Fortune applying to her a Verse of Æschilus; Tu me extulisti eodem meis (sentio) perditum.

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors dissidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen simillima:

From Wisdom Fortune differs far,
And yet in Works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successes of Humane Actions and Endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest Cause could not be given, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things of which most Men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to pass under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem Inferioris, sed non præter intentionem Superioris, (to wit, the Ordinance of God); and therefore (saith Melancthon) Quod Poeta Fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murther, He that smiteth a Man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a Man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands; we say, If he hurt him by chance: and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Ax from the Helve, whereby another is slain, was the Work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: And in Proverbs the sixteenth, The Lot is cast into the Lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: So as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the Ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the Opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called Animam Mundi, The Soul of the World, was no other than that incomprehensible Wisdom, which we express by the Name of God, governing every Being as well in Heaven as in Earth; to which Wisdom and Power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable Ordinance: sometime the stile of Fortune, because of many Effects there appear unto us no certain Causes. To this effect speaketh St.

Te facimus Fortuna Deam, cæloq; locamus. Sat. 10. 366.

Exod. 21. 12, 13.

Vers. 33.

Cic. de quasi, l. 1.

St. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis, the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the Doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was; For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his Power diversly. Sen. l. 4. c. 7

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of Good and Evil in Men, but an idle Voice, whereby we express success; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise Men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed Fools? That Riches and Honour are given to external Men, and without Kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant Men wear out their lives in poor and dejected Estates? In a word, there is no other inferiour or apparent cause, beside the partiality of Man's Affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the times wherin we live: for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart, and loving Truth; If Princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse than their own flatteries; then, I say, such an one, whose Virtue and Courage forbiddeth him to be base and a Dissembler, shall evermore hang under the Wheel: which kind of deserving well, and receiving ill, we always falsly charge Fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not Just; the General of an Army, that he is not Valiant; the great Ladies, that they are not Fair; shall never be made a Counseller, a Captain, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be Wise with a Wise Prince, Valiant with a Valiant, and Just with him that is Just, for such a one hath no Estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the Successor, if he be of contrary qualities; Sail with the Tyde of the Time, and alter Form and Condition, as the Estate or the Estate's Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible that the most base Men, and separate from all imitable Qualities, could so often attain to Honour and Riches, but by such an observant slavish course? These Men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other Men, and by making them believe that all their Vices are Virtues, and all their dusty Actions Crystalline; have yet in all Ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis insipens, arrogantiâ & plausibus capitur; Every Fool is won with his own pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoever will live altogether out of himself, and study other Mens Humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that Man which prizeth Truth and Virtue (except the Season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly-wise Man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of Times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the Author of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishop of that Age out of Ovid, while the Arrian Heresie raged:

While Fury gallops on the way,
Let no Man Fury's gallop stay.

And if Cicero (than whom that World begat not a Man of more reputed Judgment) had followed the counsel of his Brother Quintus; Potuisset (saith Petrarch) in lectulo suo mori, potuisset integro cadavere sepeliri; He might then have died the death of Nature, and been with an untorn and undissevered Body buried: for, as Petrarch in the same place noteth, Quid stultius quàm desperantem (præsertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari? What more foolish than for him that despairs (especially of the effect) to be entangled with endless contentions? Whosoever therefore will set before him Machiavel's two Marks to shoot at, (to wit) Riches and Glory, must set on and take off a back of Iron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble; for as he who first devised to add Sails to rowing Vessels, did either so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all Winds and Storms, or else he sometime or other perished by his own Invention: So that Man which prizeth Virtue for it self, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his Sails, as the divers natures of Calms and Storms require, must cut his Sails and his Cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure Navigation, (to wit) a mean and free Estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary Powers or Causes, the wit (or rather foolishness) of Man hath found out: Let us resolve with St. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of Operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all. 1 Cor. 8. 6. & 12 6.

of: In Nature, becauſe it hath an Eſſence immortal and ſpiritual; in Qualities, becauſe the ſame was by God created Holy and Righteous in Truth; in other Attributes, becauſe Man was made Lord of the World, and of the Creatures therein.

Sanctum, quia pars prior immortalis, anima, quia immortali. Ovid. Met. l. 1. 76.

Sanctius his animal, mentiſq; capacius altæ,
Deerat adhuc, & quod dominari in cætera poſſet:
Natus Homo eſt.

More holy than the reſt, and underſtanding more,
A living Creature wants, to rule all made before:
So Man began to be.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much diſpute among the Fathers, Schoolmen, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that Man was made after the Image of God, in reſpect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as St. Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe, and ſome others: Which St. Ambroſe denieth to the Woman in theſe words, Ut ſicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret Homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno Homine omne genus eſſet ſuper faciem totius terræ: Unus igitur unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem: That as God is one, one Man might be made by him; and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewiſe of one Man the whole kind ſhould be upon the face of the whole Earth: Therefore he being one, made one that ſhould have the Image of his Unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the ſame Verſe, that Man was after the Image of God in reſpect of Rule and Power; it is written Dominamini, in the plural number; And have dominion over the Fiſh in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the Woman be excluded. Others conceive, that Man is ſaid to be after the Image of God in reſpect of his Immortal Soul only: becauſe as God is inviſible, ſo the Soul of Man is inviſible; as God is immortal and incorporal, ſo is the Soul of Man immortal and incorporal; and as there is but one God which governeth the World, ſo but one Soul which governeth the Body of Man; and as God is wholly in every part of the World, ſo is the Soul of Man wholly in every part of the Body: Anima eſt tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The Soul is wholly in the whole Body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Ariſtotle; though Chalcidius and other learned Men deny that Doctrine; which that it is otherwiſe than potentially true, all the Ariſtotelians in the World ſhall never prove. Theſe and the like Arguments do the Jews make (ſaith Toſtatus) and theſe reſemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The School-men reſemble the Mind or Soul of Man to God, in this reſpect eſpecially; becauſe that as in the Mind there are three diſtinct Powers, or Faculties, (to wit) Memory, Underſtanding, and Will; and yet all theſe, being of real differences, are but one Mind: ſo in God there are three diſtinct Perſons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and yet but one God. They alſo make the Image and Similitude diverſe; and again, they diſtinguiſh between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei; and ſpin into ſmall threds, with ſubtile diſtinctions, many times the plainneſs and ſincerity of the Scriptures: their Wits being like that ſtrong Water, that eateth thorow and diſſolveth the pureſt Gold. Victorinus alſo maketh the Image of God to be ſubſtantial, but not the ſimilitude: Sed in ſubſtantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the ſubſtance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the Image and Similitude do greatly differ, ſo the ſinful Soul doth not therefore leave to be the Image of God; but it hath not his Similitude, except it be Holy and Righteous. St. Auguſtine alſo againſt Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by ſin the perfection of this Image is loſt in Man; and in his Retractions maintaineth the ſame Opinion, and alſo affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken than the Image.

But howſoever the School-men and others diſtinguiſh, or whatſoever the Fathers conceive; ſure I am, that St. Paul maketh the ſame ſenſe of the Image, which Victorinus doth of the Similitude, who ſaith; As we have born the Image of the Earthy, ſo ſhall we bear the Image of the Heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scripture, that the words Image and Similitude were uſed but in one ſenſe, and in this place the better to expreſs each other; whatſoever Lombard hath ſaid to the contrary. For God knows what a multitude of meanings the wit of Man imagineth to himſelf in the Scriptures, which neither Moſes, the Prophets, or Apoſtles, ever conceived. Now as St. Paul uſeth the word (Image) for both; ſo St. James uſeth the word (Similitude) for both, in theſe words; Therewith bleſs we God, even the Father, and therewith curſe we Men, which are made after the ſimilitude of God. Howſoever therefore St. Auguſtine ſeemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in Writing, to make ſome difference: as where he writeth, Confitemur Imaginem in Æternitate, ſimili-tudinem in moribus in veniri; We confeſs that this Image is found in Eternity, but his Similitude in Manners; that is, in the ſpiritual diſpoſitions and qualities of the Mind: Yet thus he elſewhere ſpeaketh plainly; Quaſi verò poſſit eſſe Imago aliqua, in qua Similitudo non ſit: ſi enim omnino Similis non eſt, procul dubio nec Imago eſt; As if (ſaith he) there could be any Image, where the Similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeneſs, there is no Image. The very words of the Text make this moſt manifeſt, as, Let us make Man in our Image, according to our Likeneſs: which is, Let us make Man in our Image that he may be like us: And in the next Verſe following, God himſelf maketh it plain; for there he uſeth the word (Image) only as thus; God created the Man in his Image, in the Image of God created he him. And to take away all diſpute or ambiguity, in the firſt Verſe of the fifth Chapter, the word (Similitude) is uſed again by it ſelf, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeneſs of God made he him. And this Similitude St. Paul, Coloſ. 3. v. 10. calleth the Image; Put on (ſaith he) the new Man, which is renewed in knowledg after the Image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his Image. Now if we may believe St. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolmen, then it is as manifeſt as words can make it, that the Image and Similitude is but the ſame; for St. Paul uſeth both the words directly in one ſenſe. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God to the Similitude of the Image of a corruptible Man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, That Man was formed after the Image of God, both in Body and Mind; Nulla pars in Homine, quæ non fuerit hujuſce Imaginis particeps; No part in a Man (ſaith he) which was not participating of God's Image; for God ſaid, Let us make Man according to our own Image. But the Soul alone is not Man, but the Hypoſtaſis or whole Man compounded of Body and Soul. The Body of Man (ſaith he) is the Image of the World, and called therefore Microcoſmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the World was firſt in God; ſo that Man, according to his Body, muſt needs be the Image of God. Againſt which Opinion of this learned Man, his own Objection ſeemeth to me ſufficient, where he alledgeth that it may be ſaid, That Zanch. de oper. Dei. l. 3. c. 1.

That Moses spake by the figure Synechdoche; As when a Man is called a mortal Man, yet is not the whole Man mortal, but the Body only: So when God said, Let us make Man after our Image, he meant the Soul of Man, and not the Body of Earth and Dust: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith St. Augustine): Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of Man's Body. Deus enim non est humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum Divinæ (saith Philo); God is not partaker of humane Form, nor humane Body of the Form Divine. The Hebrew word for Image, is Tselem, which signifieth a Shadow or obscure resemblance: In Imagine pertransit Homo; Man passeth away in a Shadow. Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the very Essence and Majesty of God.

In Gen.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding than these gross Hereticks: Ad similitudinem Dei propiùs accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The virtue which is in Man, (saith he) came nearer the Similitude of God than the Figure. For God is a spiritual Substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God; God is Merciful; God is Charity it self; and (in a word) Goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us know of himself. What then can be the Shadow of such a Substance, the Image of such a Nature? Or wherein can Man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness? Certainly, not in dominion alone; for the Devil is said to be the Prince of this World: and the Kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect Image of his Father. Neither because Man hath an immortal Soul, and therein the Faculties of Memory, Understanding, and Will; for the Devils are also immortal, and participate those Faculties, being called Dæmones, because scientes of knowledg and subtilty: Neither because we are reasonable Creatures, by which we are distinguished from Beasts: For who hath rebelled against God? Who have made gods of the vilest Beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owls; yea, even of shameful parts, of Lusts and Pleasures, but reasonable Men? Yet do I not condemn the Opinion of St. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching Dominion, but that, in respect thereof, Man was in some sort after the Image of God; if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Justice and Piety. For God did not only make Man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowls of Heaven, (or of the Air) and over the Beasts of the Field: But God gave unto Man a dominion over Men, he appointed Kings to govern them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding: For I do not conceive, that Ireneus did therefore call Man the Image of God, because he was Animal rationale only; but that he understood it better, with Sybilla; Imago mea est Homo, rectam rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (i. e.) by right reason to know and confess God his Creator, and the same God to serve, love, and obey: And therefore said Saint Augustine, (who herein came nearer the Truth) Fecit Deus Hominem ad Imaginem & Similitudinem suam in mente; God made Man in respect of the Intellect after his own Image and Similitude: And Reynerius, Homo, quòd habet mentem, factus est ad Imaginem Dei; Man was made after the Image of God, in Mind, or, in that he hath a mind.

SECT. II.

Of the Intellectual Mind of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sin.

But Mens is not taken here for Anima Physica, according to Aristotle, which is, Forma vel Natura Hominis, The Form or Nature of Man; but this Faculty or Gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis Animi, the principal strength of the Mind, or Soul; cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplato; whose Act, Exercise, or Office, is the perpetual contemplation of Truth; and therefore it is also called Intellectus Divinus, Intellectus Contemplativus, & Anima Contemplativa, A Divine Understanding, and an Intellect or Mind Contemplative. Est autem mens nostra (saith Cusanus) vis comprehendendi; & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectual Mind (saith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: Unto which Mercurius attributeth so much, (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very Essence of God, (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) than the Light from the Sun: for this Mens or Understanding, (saith Mercurius) Est Deus in Hominibus, Is God in Men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the Image of God in Man. For, as the Sun is not of the same Essence or Nature with the Divine Light, but a Body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or Understanding in Men, not of the Essence of God's infinite Understanding, but a power and faculty of our Souls the purest; or, the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternal Light illightned. And this Mens others call Animam Animæ, The Soul of the Soul; or, with St. Augustine, the Eye of the Soul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine Knowledg, Quæ amorem sapientiæ tanquam ducem sequitur, Which followeth after the love of Sapience as her guide (saith Philo); between which and Reason; between which and the Mind, called Anima; between which and that power which the Latins call Animus, there is this difference: Reason is that Faculty by which we judge and discourse; Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima Corpus animat, id est, vivificat; or, The Soul is that which doth animate the Body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the separation of Body and Soul: And the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or Mind, or Soul, in Man. Animus, is that by which we will and make Election; and to this Basil agreeth, which called this Mens, or Divine Understanding, Perspicacem Animæ partem, The perceiving part of the Mind, or, The Light by which the Soul discerneth: Dormientum Mens, non Anima, sopitur; & in furiosis Mens extinguitur, Anima manet; In Men that sleep it is this (Mens, or) Understanding, and not the Mind or Soul which resteth; during which time it is but habitual in wise Men, and in mad Men this (Mens) is extinguished, and not the Soul; for mad Men do live, though distract.

Sen. ep. 65. f. & 31. f. Lib. 9. c. 5.

Therefore this word being often used for the Soul giving Life, is attributed abusively to mad Men, when we say that they are of a distract Mind, instead of a broken Understanding: which Word (Mind) we use also for Opinion, as, I am of this Mind, or that Mind: and sometimes for Mens Conditions or Virtues, as, He is of an honest Mind, or, a Man of a just juſt Mind: ſometimes for Affection, as, I do this for my Mind's ſake: and Ariſtotle ſometimes uſeth this word (Mens) for the Phantaſie, which is the ſtrength of the Imagination: ſometimes for the knowledg of Principles, which we have without Diſcourſe: Oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is uſed in the proper ſignification, including both the Underſtanding agent and poſſible, it is deſcribed to be, a pure, ſimple, ſubſtantial Act, not depending upon Matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his firſt Object: Or more at large thus, A part or particle of the Soul, whereby it doth underſtand, not depending upon Matter, nor needing any Organ, free from paſſion coming from without, and apt to be diſſevered, as, Eternal from that which is Mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Anima eſt Imago Mentis, Mens Imago Dei; Deus Menti præeſt, Mens Animæ, Anima Corpori; The Soul (meaning that which giveth Life) is the Image of this Underſtanding, or Mens; and this Mens, or Underſtanding, is the Image of God. God is Preſident or Ruler over this Underſtanding, this Underſtanding over the Soul, and this Soul over the Body. This diviſion and diſtinction out of the Platonicks and Peripateticks I leave to the Reader to judg of. That Mens humana hath no need of any Organ, Marcilius Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Soul's Immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (ſaith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam, non eget Mens Organo, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intuatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat. Hoc autem objectum ſunt phantaſmata, ſeu rerum à ſenſibus perceptarum ſimulachra ad phantaſiam prolata: To exerciſe the Faculty of Underſtanding, the Mind of Man (ſaith he) needeth no Inſtrument, as a mean, by which it may underſtand: but it needeth an Object whereon to look, and whence to conceive the Act of Underſtanding. This Object are the phantaſms, or the reſemblances of things received from the ſenſe, and carried to the phantaſie. But in effect, his concluſion ſeemeth to carry a contrary ſenſe, when he maketh the Phantaſie, in repreſenting the Object to the Underſtanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be underſtood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the Underſtanding. And he addeth, that the reſemblance of things in Man's imagination are to his Underſtanding and Mind, as Colours are to the ſight; whence it ſo followeth, that the imagination or phantaſie it ſelf is to the faculty of Underſtanding, as the eye is to the faculty of ſeeing: and as this is an Organum, ſo that. Of this queſtion, How the Mind in all her actions maketh uſe of the Body, and hath communion with the Body, I refer the Reader to a moſt grave and learned Diſcourſe, in the laſt Reply of M. D. Bilſon, late Biſhop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. Howſoever the Truth be determined, we muſt conclude, that it is neither in reſpect of Reaſon alone, by which we diſcourſe, nor in reſpect of the Mind it ſelf, by which we live, nor in reſpect of our Souls ſimply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image God. But moſt ſafely may we reſemble our ſelves to God in mente, and in reſpect of that pure Faculty, which is never ſeparate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all, for St. Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Mind or Soul, and between the infuſion of Qualities, Endowments, and Gifts of Grace wherewith it is adorned and enriched; which being added to the Nature, Eſſence, and Faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God: whoſe words are theſe, Non propterea Imago Dei eſt, quia ſui meminit Mens, ſeque intelligit & diligit, (which alſo was the Opinion of St. Auguſtine) ; ſed quia poteſt meminiſſe, intelligere, ac diligere cum à quo facta eſt, (that is) The Mind (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, becauſe it remembreth, underſtandeth, and loveth it ſelf; but becauſe it can remember, underſtand, and love God who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Baſil; Homo ad Imaginem & Similitudinem Dei factus eſt; Peccatum verò Imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum Animam corruptis concupiſcentiæ affectibus immerſit: Man was made after the Image and Similitude of God; but Sin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our Minds into corrupt concupiſcence.

Pag. 185. & ſequent. Ad imaginem Dei creavit illum, id eſt, ſapientiæ, virtutis, ac bonitatis compotem, qui ſeſe intuitus Creatorem agnoſceret ſuum; atq; imitari, pro ingenii, præſq; auctoritatis ſibi conceſſa ratione, ſtuderet. Exam.

It is not therefore (as aforeſaid) by reaſon of Immortality, nor in Reaſon, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of theſe by it ſelf, nor in all theſe joyned, by any of which, or by all which we reſemble, or may be called the Shadow of God, though by Reaſon and Underſtanding, with the other faculties of the Soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in reſpect of the habit of Original Righteouſneſs, moſt perfectly infuſed by God into the Mind and Soul of Man in his firſt Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the Seal of God's Image, (though Reaſon may be ſaid to be of her Gift, which, joyned to the Soul, is a part of the Eſſential Conſtitution of our proper Species) but from the bountiful Grace of the Lord of all goodneſs, who breathed Life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Duſt and Clay the inimitable hability of his own Piety and Righteouſneſs.

So long therefore (for that reſemblance which Dominion hath) do thoſe that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exerciſe the Office or Magiſtracy to which they are called, and ſincerely walk in the Ways of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other Men ſo long retain this Image, as they fear, love, and ſerve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruiſe and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntrary Offences, and obſtinate Sins. For the unjuſt Mind cannot be after the Image of God, ſeeing God is Juſtice it ſelf; The blood-thirſty hath it not, for God is Charity and Mercy it ſelf; Falſhood, cunning Practice, and Ambition, are properties of Satan, and therefore cannot dwell in one Soul together with God: And to be ſhort, there is no likelyhood between pure Light and black Darkneſs, between Beauty and Deformity, or between Righteouſneſs and Reprobation. And though Nature, according to common underſtanding, have made us capable by the power of Reaſon, and apt enough to receive this Image of God's goodneſs, which the ſenſual Souls of Beaſts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and imbrace the falſe and dure-leſs pleaſures of this Stage-play World, than to become the ſhadow of God, by walking after him, had not the exceeding Workmanſhip of God's Wiſdom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed Eyes to our Souls, as to our Bodies; which piercing through the impurity of our fleſh, behold the higheſt Heavens, and thence bring Knowledg and Object to the Mind and Soul, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and termleſs Joy, prepared for thoſe which retain the Image and Similitude of their Creator, preſerving undefiled and unrent the Garment of the new Man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteouſneſs and Holineſs, as ſaith St. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by ſome of the Fathers, as by St. Auguſtine, with whom St. Ambroſe joyneth, That by Sin the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it self: both Opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in Man, may be taken two ways; for, either it is considered according to natural Gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding Nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sin, than the very reasonable or understanding Nature, &c. is lost, (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts): or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural Gifts, namely, of Divine Grace and Heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural Image; and this manner of Similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by Sin.

SECT. III.

Of our base and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal Soul.

THe external Man God formed out of the Dust of the Earth, or (according to the signification of the word Adam) of Adamath, of Red Earth, or ex limo Terræ, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguissima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay; but out of Clay, Earth, or Dust, God formed and made Flesh, Blood, and Bone, with all parts of Man. Arias Mont. de nat. f. 156.

That Man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledg, when in humble fear he called unto God to save Sodom: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but Dust and Ashes: And, In these Houses of Clay, whose Foundation is in the Dust, do our Souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every-where behold the sudden and resistless assaults of Death; and Nature assureth us by never-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible Demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our Bodies are but the Anvils of Pain and Diseases, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbred Cares, Sorrows, and Passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted Posts against which Envy and Fortune direct their Darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our Condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our Understanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassal and Slave of Death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soul, which can neither die with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous Men: seeing God's Justice in the one, and his Goodness in the other, is exercised for ever-more, as the ever-living subjects of his Reward and Punishment. But when is it that we examine this great Account? Never while we have one vanity left us to spend: We plead for Titles, till our Breath fail us; dig for Riches, while our Strength enableth us; exercise Malice, while we can revenge; and then, when time hath beaten from us both Youth, Pleasure, and Health, and that Nature it self hateth the house of old Age, we remember with Job, That we must go the way from whence we shall not return, and that our Bed is made ready for us in the dark; And then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our Conscience, (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives) we behold therein the fearful Images of our Actions past, and withal this terrible Inscription; That God will bring every Work into judgment, that Man hath done under the Sun. Gen. 18. 27. Job 4. 27. Job 10. 21. & 17. 13. Eccl. 12. 14.

But what Examples have ever moved us? What Perswasions reformed us? or what Threatnings made us afraid? We behold other Mens Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promised and threatned: but the World's bright Glory hath put out the Eyes of our Minds; and these betraying Lights (with which we only see) do neither look up towards termless Joys, nor down towards endless Sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the World's hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus; iisque perielis
Tentati: nihilo meliores reddimur unquam;
Sub vitiis nullo culparum fine manentes.

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What er'st we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend;
In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal Souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Frustra sperant qui sic de Misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, (saith Bernard) which in this sort flatter themselves with God's Mercy. Bern. in Psal. qui habitat.

SECT. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life which God breathed into Man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the Breath of Life; and the Man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a Body of Earth and of corruptible Matter, a Soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily Instruments as Men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into Man, as he breatheth his Grace daily into such as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (saith Elihu in Job) hath made me, and the Breath of the Almighty hath given me Life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formâsse Corpus Hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis suis inspirâsse in faciem formati, ut vivere posset & spiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quàm propria, (id est, juxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari,) loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggarliness of carnal sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made Man's body of slime, or breathed with Jaws or Lips upon his Face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of Life: For the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands have made me, spake this Tropically, rather than properly, (that is) according to the custom which Men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt, & In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a Job 33. 4.

carnal sense? By this Breath was infused into Man both Life and Soul; and therefore this (Soul) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give Life to the Body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job; and this Spirit which God breathed into Man, which is the reasonable Soul of Man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the Body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes; And Dust shall return to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the Spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scripture than for the Soul: As when Stephen cryed unto God; Domine suscipe Spiritum meum, Lord Jesus receive my Spirit: And in St. John, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his Life and Soul left his Body dead. And that the immortal Soul of Man differeth from the Souls of Beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest; for it is written, Let the Waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the Beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let us make Man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his Face the Breath of Life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those Creatures brought forth, and thence received Life; so shall they again be dissolved into the same first Matter whence they were taken: but the Life of Breath everlasting, which God breathed into Man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

SECT. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little World: With a digression touching our Mortality.

MAn thus compounded and formed by God, was an Abstract, or Model, or brief Story in the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation and work of the World, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a Divine Understanding, by which he might contemplate and serve his Creator, after whose Image he was formed, and endued with the Powers and Faculties of Reason and other Abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other God's Creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living Natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an Intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual Nature, he vouchsafed unto Man both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto Man: and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzen) Homo est utriusque Naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chain which tieth together both Natures: And because in the little frame of Man's Body there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there; therefore was Man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem fecit, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnum, atque exiguo totum, in Terris statuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the Man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the Flesh of Man, and therefore heavy and lumpish: the Bones of his Body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; Of which Ovid:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is,

Approving, that our Bodies of a stony Nature are.

His Blood, which disperseth it self by the Branches of Veins through all the Body, may be resembled to those Waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the Earth; his Breath to the Air; his natural heat, to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it self; which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical Moisture, Oil, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the Hairs of Man's Body, which adorn or overshadow it, to the Grass, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative Power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our Determinations, to the light, wandring, and unstable Clouds, carried every-where with uncertain Winds; our Eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our Youth to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of Wind blow them from the Stalks; the thoughts of our Mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual Natures, which are always present with God: And lastly, Our immortal Souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the Title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no Man just, or good, or righteous, (for, In Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job); yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the Substance and the Shadow, there may be found a goodness in Men: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called Man the Image and Similitude of his own Righteousness. In this also is the little World of Man compared, and made more like the Universal, (Man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras:) That the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of Man the seven Planets; Whereof our Infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercury, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the days of Love, Desire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful Age of Man's Life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take accompt of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our Understanding; the last, and seventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are sad and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are Sicknesses, and variable Infirmities; and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unsociable to others, we become a burthen to our our selves being of no other use, than to hold the Riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal Habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of Death, finish the sorrowful business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: Neither have those beloved companions of Honour and Riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of Entertainments; but by what crooked Path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the House of Death, whose Doors lie open at all hours, and to all Persons. For this Tide of Man's Life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again: Our Leaf once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again with the Garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

For if there were any baiting-place, or rest, in the course or race of Man's Life, then, according to the Doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the Sap and Juyce, wherein the Life of Plants is preserved, doth ever-more ascend or descend; so is it with the Life of Man, which is always either increasing towards ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenness and dissolution.

SECT. VI.

Of the free power which Man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

THese be the Miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his Creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him a mortal and Immortal Life, a Nature Celestial and Terrene; and (indeed) God gave Man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. God made Man in the beginning (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God and Man's felicity: whereas Beasts, and all other Creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius), and that even when they first fell from the Bodies of their Dams, the Nature which they could not change; and the supernal Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto Man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of Life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth Fruit agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first Man Adam, and our first Father, was ænigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the Person and Fable of Proteus; who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that Men were transformed into divers shapes of Beasts, thereby to shew the change of Mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other Creatures did those Ancients represent the variable Passions and Affections of mortal Men; as by Serpents, were signified Deceivers; by Lions, Oppressors, and cruel Men; by Swine, Men given over to Lust and Sensuality; by Wolves, ravening and greedy Men; which also St. Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, which come to you in Sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: By the Images of Stones and Stocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungrateful Men: Of which St. John Baptist, O ye Generation of Vipers, &c.

SECT. VII.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

IN this Work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a Man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; with whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day, (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of Creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto Man a power generative, and so to the rest of living Creatures, to Plants and Flowers, their Seeds in themselves; and commanded Man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth Creatures according to their several kinds: All which being finished, God saw that his Works were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the Field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of Good; thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple purity, and from so excellent a Cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect Effect. For Man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of Man's Heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all Creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the Righteous Man, Noah and his Family, with those Creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the Place of Paradise.

SECT. I.

That the Seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that Men should err.

COncerning the first Habitation of Man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he made, Gen. 2. 6. Of this Seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the Opinions and Judgments have been in effect as divers among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the Terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the World's Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judg, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own Judgments, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos Errores, magnorum virorum authoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We pass over many gross Errors, by the authority of great Men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by Truth: for they were Men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no Man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto Men such a proportion of Knowledg, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledg of all things to any one. St. Paul confess'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men nor Angels knew of the latter Day; and therefore, seeing knowledg is infinite, it is God (according to St. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (saith Job)? But where is Wisdom found? and where is the place of Understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the Living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, Mens Judgments (which inhabit the Houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned Men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our Salvation depended not.

SECT. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

NOw touching Paradise; first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mystical and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers, Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledg, there were delivered unto us other Mysteries and Significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oil, Wine, Milk, and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis); whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34 Annotation of his fifth Book, fol. 338. the last Edition.

Bartas. sem. 2. l. 1. 143.

St. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our Souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or Garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or, Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of Good and Evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the Virtues of the Mind, or in the Mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a Celestial and Terrestrial Paradise; the one into which St. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamensis was of Opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the Earth; the same being not only defaced, but withal the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which Opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words in two several places. First, upon this, Fill the Earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus consitam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth Fruit, and multiply, and fill the Earth, and subdue it, and rule over every Creature, do clearly shew, that the Universal Earth, set or filled with all sorts of Fruits, (as then it was) was the Garden and Seat of Adam, and of his future Posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of Acts 17. 26. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideò factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem Terræ: tota igitur Terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one Blood all Mankind, to dwell over all the face of the Earth: and therefore all the Earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which Conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this Opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth near the River of Acesines, in the Confines of India.

Bart. 16. 126. Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the Equinoctial; and Postellus, quite contrary, under the North Pole: The Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the Opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a Figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible World, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air: Strabus and Rabanus were both sick of this Vanity, with Origen and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Bareephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins says of Philo Judæus, that he wondered, Quo malo genio afflatus, By what evil Angel he was blown up into this Error: So can I but greatly marvel at the learned Men, who so grosly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the Points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea or Canaan.

Bed. in Gen. Pet. Comest. l. 1. cap. 3. Mos. Barc. de par.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers, of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, were it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

SECT. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the Earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he had made: And howsoever the vulgar Translation, called Jerom's Translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of the Region. For, What sense hath this Translation (saith our Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure; or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, or for a Noun Appellative: which Region, in respect of the fertility of the Soil, of the many beautiful Rivers, and goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their Leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, Pleasantness, or Delicacy; as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: And this is the mistaking, which may end the Dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, That as Florida was a Country, so called, for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region, called Pleasure, or Delicacy, for its pleasure or delicacy: And as Florida signifieth Flourishing, so Eden signifieth Pleasure; and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region, (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choise Seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure. Gen. 2.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the Translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabbins, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latins, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio; for Damascene's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter consitus; Paradise is a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned Man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, do both understand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words; After this I will begin to speak of Paradise Terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso Terrestri, quem plantâsse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissimè prodit, Paradisum à Deo consitum in Regione Terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto Capite Gen. ubi legimus, Cham habitâsse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise radiſe was planted of God in a Region of the East Country, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a Verſ. 16. proper Name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Geneſis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Heden. Pererius endeavoureth to qualifie this Tranſlation; for this Particle (ſaith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to the very firſt day; alledging this place of Chriſt,

Joh. 8. 44. that although the Devil was ſaid to be a Man-ſlayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the ſixth day. But ſurely, as I think (referring my ſelf to better Judgments) the Devil was from the inſtant of his fall a Man-ſlayer in diſpoſition, though he had not whereon to practiſe till Man's Creation. And for concluſion, St. Hierom (if that be his Tranſlation) adviſeth himſelf better in the end of the third Chapter of Geneſis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did ſet a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradiſum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himſelf acknowledgeth, that this is the true ſenſe of this place, preciſely taken, according to the Hebrew, Poſuit à parte Orientali horti Heden
Gen. 3. 14. Cherubin; He ſet on the East-ſide of the Garden of Heden a Cherubin: Bacanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) ſignifieth (with) as well as (in) and ſo the Text beareth this ſenſe; That God planted a Garden with Pleaſure, (that is to ſay) full of pleaſure. But Bacanus followeth this conſtruction, only to the end to find Paradiſe upon the River of Aſecines; for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he ſuppoſeth to be the Tree of Knowledg of Good and Evil, and would therefore draw Paradiſe to the Fig-tree: which Conceit of his I will anſwer hereafter.

Now, becauſe Paradiſe was ſeated by Moſes toward the Eaſt, thence came the cuſtom of praying toward the Eaſt, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built Eaſt and Weſt, as to the Point where the Sun riſeth in March, which is directly over Paradiſe (ſaith Damaſcenus): affirming, That we always pray towards the Eaſt, as looking towards Paradiſe, whence we were caſt out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Prieſts and Sacrifices, which turned themſelves in Service and Divine Ceremonies, always towards the Weſt, thereby to avoid the ſuperſtition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But becauſe Eaſt and Weſt are but in reſpect of places; (for although Paradiſe were Eaſt from Judea, yet it was Weſt from Perſia) and the ſerving of God is every-where in the World: The matter is not great which way we turn our faces, ſo our hearts ſtand right, other than this, that we who dwell Weſt from Paradiſe, and pray turning our ſelves towards the Eaſt, may remember thereby to beſeech God, that as by Adam's fall we have loſt the Paradiſe on Earth; ſo by Chriſt's Death and Paſſion we may be made Partakers of the Paradiſe Celeſtial, and the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other myſtery in adding the word (Eaſt) to Eden by Moſes, than to ſhew that the Region of Eden, in which Paradiſe was, lay Eaſtward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures always called the People of thoſe Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Meſopotamia, Chaldea, and Perſia: Of which Ovid.

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabathæaq; regna receſſit,
Perſidaque, & radiis juga ſubdita matutinis.

The East Wind with Aurora hath abiding
Among th' Arabian and the Perſian Hills,
Whom Phœbus firſt ſalutes at his firſt riſing.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the Prophet, threatning the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in reſpect of thoſe Nations that followed Nabuchodonozer, and of whom the greateſt part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it ſelf ſtood North from Jeruſalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Tranſlation, Peter Comeſtor giveth beſt ſatisfaction: for he uſeth the word From the beginning, that is, from the firſt part of the World, (à principio) id eſt, (ſaith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the ſame ſignification: From the beginning and Eaſtward is all one; à principio idem eſt quod ad Orientem.

To return to the proof of this place, and that this ſtory of Mankind was not Alegorically, it followeth in the Text of the 2d Chap. and the 9th ver. in theſe words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleaſant to the ſight, and good for Meat, &c. So as firſt it appeared that God created Adam elſewhere as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expreſſed, that he might dreſs it and keep it; Paradiſe Verſ. 18. being a Garden, or Orchard, filled with Plants and Trees of the moſt excellent kinds, pleaſant to behold, and (withal) good for Meat: which proveth that Paradiſe was a Terreſtrial Garden, garniſhed with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taſte. And Verſ. 10. to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical conſtruction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expreſſing alſo the Region out of which this River ſprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is alſo a Country Ezek. 27. near unto Charan in Meſopotamia, Ezekiel witneſ- 23. ſeth.

But to all theſe Cabaliſts, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius anſwereth in theſe words; Si Paradiſus non eſt ſenſibilis, non eſt etiam fons; ſi non eſt fons, non eſt flumen; ſi non eſt flumen, non ſunt quatuor principia, non Piſon, non Gihon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non eſt ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de Arbore, non eſt Adam, non ſunt Homines, ſed veritas jam fabula eſt, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur; If Paradiſe be not ſenſible, then there was no Fountain, and then no River; if no River, then no ſuch four Heads or Branches, and then not any ſuch River, as Piſon or Gihon, Tigris or Euphrates; no ſuch Fig-tree, or Fruit, or Leaves; Eve then did not eat of the Fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any Man; the truth was but a Fable, and all things eſteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the ſame effect hath St. Hierome upon Daniel; Conticeſcant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate ſequentes, ipſam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradiſum & Flumina, & Arbores putent Allegoriæ Legibus ſe debere ſubruere: Let the dotage of them be ſilent, who following Shadows and Images in the Truth, endeavour to ſubvert the Truth it ſelf, and think that they ought to bring Paradiſe, and the Rivers, and the Trees, under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifeſt. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of Knowledg excepted) which Trees Moſes in the ninth Verſe ſaith that they were good to eat; meaning the Fruit which they bare. Beſides, God left all Beaſts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and theſe Beaſts were neither in the third Heaven, nor near the Circle of the Moon, nor Beaſts in Imagination: for if all these things were Enigmatical or Mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezekiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech; All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be Terrestrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant Men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future Ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophesie) to be apt to fabulous Inventions; and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Mankind. And, is it likely there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof; being compared to a Seat and Soil of far exceeding excellency.

Gen. 13. 10.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. And whence are their praises of the Elisian Fields, but out of the Story of Paradise? To which also appertain those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Ovid. Met. l. 2.

Ver erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris,
Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The joyful Spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet Flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer; and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their Inventions, by venting the stoln Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane Additions, and disguised by poetical Conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own Speculations and Contemplations.

But besides all these Testimonies, if we find what Region Heden or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into four Branches; together with the Kingdoms of Havila and Cush; and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no Man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegorical sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the Old Testament throughout; the Story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose, (saith St. Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantùm (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three Opinions of Paradise; The one of those Men, which will have it altogether Corporal; a second of those, which conceive it altogether Spiritual, and to be a Figure of the Church; the third of those, which take it in both senses: which third Opinion St. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable Judgment; Quemadmodum Homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As Man was created at one time, both sensible and intelligible; so was this holy Grove, or Garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form.

SECT. IV.

Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

But it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledg thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, That there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World; from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few Men in the World that would give any credit unto it. For what could seem more ridiculous than the report of such a place? And besides, what maketh this Seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India; and Gihon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt: And these two Rivers so far distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these Streams can no way be compriſed therein.

Secondly, If the Birth and Works, and Death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Countrey, of which no Man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of Men: for Times and Places are approved witnesses of worldly Actions.

Thirdly, If we should relie, or give place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Genesis, (though otherwise for their Doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the Circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable World, and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any Man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words; Est autem locus amœnissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeò elevatus, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone, by a long long tracti of Land and Sea, elevated ſo, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moon.

And Moſes Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner; Deinde hoc quoque reſponſum volumus, Paradiſum multò ſublimiore poſſitum eſſe regione, atque hæc noſtra extet terra, eòque fieri ut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non poſſis; eòque impetu impulſi preſſique ſub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rurſus proſiliant ebulliántque in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this ſenſe; Furthermore (ſaith he) we give this for an anſwer, That Paradiſe is ſet in a Region far raiſed above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to paſs, that from thence theſe Rivers fall down with ſuch a headlong violence, as words cannot expreſs; and with that force ſo impulſed and preſt, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again riſe and boil up in this our habitable World: And to this he addeth the Opinion of Ephram, which is this; Ephram dicit, Paradiſum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita poſitum eſſe, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet Regione, non aliter atque Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradiſe doth compaſs or embrace the whole Earth, and is ſo ſet beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orb of the Earth on every ſide, as the Orb of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that theſe ridiculous Expoſitions and Opinions do not bring Queſtion unto Truth it ſelf, or make the ſame ſubject to Doubts or Diſputes, it is neceſſary to diſcover the true place of Paradiſe, which God in his wiſdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melanchon ſays) in parte Terræ meliore, in the beſt part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Univerſal might be filled with People and planted; and by knowing this place, we ſhall the better judg of the beginning of Nations, and of the World's inhabitation: For near unto this did the Sons of Noah alſo diſperſe themſelves after the Flood, into all other remote remote Regions and Countries. And if it be a generous deſire in Men, to know from whence their own Forefathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be diſpleaſing to underſtand the place of our firſt Anceſtor, from whence all the Streams and Branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that ſuch a place there was as Paradiſe, and that the knowledg of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine ſeveral Opinions before remembred, by the Truth it ſelf; and to ſee how they agree with the ſenſe of the Scripture, and with common Reaſon; and afterward to prove directly, and to delienate the Region in which God firſt planted this delightful Garden.

SECT. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradiſe, nor cauſed Hills in the Earth.

And firſt, whereas it is ſuppoſed by Aug. Chyſamenſis, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in ſuch ſort, as no Man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which Opinion there were others alſo, aſcribing to the Flood the cauſe of thoſe high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other ſtrange effects): For mine own Opinion, I think neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the Face of Paradiſe was after the Flood withered and grown old, in reſpect of the firſt beauty (for both the Ages of Men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed): yet if there had been no ſign of any ſuch place, or if the Soil and Seat had not remained, then would not Moſes, who wrote of Paradiſe about 850 years after the Flood, have deſcribed it ſo particularly, and the Prophets long after Moſes, would not have made ſo often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it ſelf were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of Time made it one common Field and Paſture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is ſtill the ſame, and the Rivers ſtill remain the ſame Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tygris and Euphrates, we are ſure to find in what Longitude Paradiſe lay; and learning out one of theſe Rivers, which afterward doth divide it ſelf into four Branches, we are ſure that the Partition is at the very border of the Garden it ſelf. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four Heads; Now, whether the word in the Latin Tranſlation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it ſelf, or to Paradiſe; yet the diviſion, and branching of thoſe Rivers, muſt be in the North or South ſide of the very Garden, (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore theſe Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifeſtly known, there could be no ſuch defacing by the Flood, as is ſuppoſed. Furthermore, as there is no likelyhood that the place could be ſo altered, as future Ages knew it not, ſo is there no probability that either theſe Rivers were turned out of their courſes, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforeſaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decreaſe, was the cauſe of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what deſcent of Waters could there be in a Spherical and round Body, wherein there is nor high nor low? ſeeing that all violent force of Waters is either by the ſtrength of Wind, by deſcent from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Flood of the Sea. But that there was any Wind (whereby the Seas are moſt enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable; for it is written, Therefore God made a Wind to paſs upon the Earth, and the Waters ceaſed. So as it appeareth not, that, until the Waters ſank, there was any Wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodneſs, cauſed the Wind to blow, to dry up the abundant ſlime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanſe the Air of thick Vapours, and unwholſome Miſts: and this we know by experience, that all down-right Rains do evermore diſſever the violence of outragious Winds, and beat down, and level the ſwelling and mountainous Billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Floods there could be none, when the Waters were equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bays, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any deſcent, or violent falling of Waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforeſaid: and therefore it ſeemeth moſt agreeable to reaſon, that the Waters rather ſtood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Flood made no ſuch deſtroying alteration, Joſephus avoweth that one of thoſe Pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be ſeen in his days; which Pillars were ſet up above 1426 years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joſeph himſelf to have lived ſome forty or fifty years after Chriſt: of whom, although there be no cauſe to believe all that he

Gen. 2. 10.

Gen. 8. 1.

he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written, that Berosus (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruines thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his days, who lived in the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maximæ & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certain Altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other City, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the World, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains
Gen. 4. 17. from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood overflowed by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountains. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus Mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos, sermo est, Diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Minyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is said, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, though it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons, (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterward, and ever since, known by the same names; and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Flood; on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all Authority, either divine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth,
Gen. 8. 11. which she had pluckt, and which (until the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floting on the water; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters: for it is written; folium, Olivæ raptum, or decerptum, a leaf pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

SECT. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chysamensis being answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply; Fill the Gen. 1. 28
Earth, and subdue it; Rule over every Creature, &c. with Acts 17.
this of the Acts, And hath made of one blood all mankind, 26 to dwell on all the face of the Earth; do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's Posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultive, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his Gen. 2. 8. transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Universal; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Gen. 3. 24.
Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there shoul grow but one Thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates, (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understod, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havilah in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius, That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adam's shin-bones must have contained a thousand fathome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

SECT. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the Air.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geography of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest Heaven; It may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

Diog. Laert. Soc. True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one onely powerful God; and therefore did the Devil himself do him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise; and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of Mount Athos (called Acrothonos) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many years) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-liv'd. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preserved till the last Judgment: which Irenæus and Justin Martyr also believe. But this opinion was of all Catholick Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Council damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this Judgment: Sicut certum est, Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they live, in Paradise, or elsewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the far distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferiour to that of the Inventer.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolomy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the Sun's light all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those falls of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupæ, or over-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-fals, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrose. Cicero Somn. Scip.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his Wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the Earth, saving eight persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be. 1 Cor. 15. 36. 51. 1 Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Air, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelm it:) this is also contrary to the expres letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we as well give credit to Masius Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirm, that there were of the Gyants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the School-men are) full of distinction, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by Miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise Gen. 7. 19.

was so seated, as Beda and others seem to affirm in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to shift, then to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Athos, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountain-tops, do not find the Ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence wash'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self-Hills the Air is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any resistance of Air to mount her self by.

SECT. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climats.

THose which come nearer unto Reason, find Paradise under the Æquinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging that there-under might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sun. But this is (non causa pro causa,) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four Rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees nearer the Tropicks, and so toward the Æquinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countreys which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and nearest to the Line it self. For hereof Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed, it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the World, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by tryal and the witness of mens travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Esay) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest Regions of the World, seated under the Æquinoctial line, or neer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easterly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the intire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, neer the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper: Onely there are some Tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this Air and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the World. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountains, and little Brooks, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade; so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever beating, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never uncloathed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona any time despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his Winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countreys called Terræ vitiosæ, Vicious Countreys: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that, to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse, and (to say the truth) all the School-men were gross in this particular. Isay. 45. 1.

SECT. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlosyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved, out of Esa. 37. and Ezek. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof; for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembred, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well Antient as Modern.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised, once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: And after them, the Turk hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the antient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tygris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two Considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judæa; and, that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judæa Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are express'd to run out of it: So as it followeth that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the Rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour-Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay, I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabsakeh: Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as Gosan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the Children of Eden, which were at Telassar? And in Ezechiel, where he prophecieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

Isai. 37. v. 12.

Cap. 27. v. 23.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens; one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof the first maketh Syria Damascene, or Dicapolitan: the second part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwise Convallis, or the Tract of Chamath, where Assyria is joyned to Arabia the Desart, and where Ptolemie placeth the City of Averia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cælo-Syria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cæle in Greek is Cava in Latin. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradise, the Jews believed this Cælo-Syria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though, to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to find out Eden, which as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red-Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isaiah and and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (saith Isaiah) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezechiel) The Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath ever been the custom, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterwards to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding Trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-Town of that part of the World, reciteth both the People, with whom they Commerce, and also what commodities every Country yielded; and having counted the several People and Countreys, he addeth the particular Trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue Silk, and of broydered works, fine Linnen, Coral, and Pearl: And afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The Merchants of Sheba, and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all precious Stones, and Gold. Now, these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Fœlix yield: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulf, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gums, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded: and (withall) having Trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of Spices, and plenty of Gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans, or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Terredon, (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich Merchandizes by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reached within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterwards to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now, the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this Trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Persia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolomitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I mean, on the East-side of Tygris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Pliny placeth the Schenitæ upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these People of Canneh (afterwards Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves, from their own City of Canneh in Shinar, Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Ptolemy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam, & Babyloniam euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which travel from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those that take Canneh for Charran, do much misstake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldæa (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Asher, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometimes called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia; or Aran, fluviorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, A Countrey between Rivers: for Mesos in Greek, is medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it self, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in his description of Arabia, giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Cœlosyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Desarts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth between Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were Neighbours (indifferent) to Charran, and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was antiently called Chalanne (witness Appian) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalne, or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next unto it, (as) Thilbe-Canne, and Mann-Canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite unto it; where these Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many Ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecimo die; When they returned they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineveh) the eleventh day. Judg. 1

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the High-Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Mesoptamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this City is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many Scriptures, but withall exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Crassus the Roman, who for his unsatiable greedines, was called Gurges avaritiæ; The Gulf of Avarice. Whereof Lucan: Acts 7. 1.

With Roman bloud th' Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this City Canne, or Chalne, is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of Nimrod; And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalu, in the Land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Gen. 10. 10. Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it self, Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith Comestor.) Three names of one Countrey: which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid.) Verse 2

Now Shinar being Babylonia and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Isaiah in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it self lyeth, it is necessary to describe those other Countreys, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the Sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the Sons of Cush were Seba, & Havila & Sabtah, & Raamah &c. And the Sons of Raamah were Sheba, &c. and anon after; Cush begat Nimrod: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, & Nimrod the Son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raamah and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezechiel) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba, were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all Spices, and all precious Stones, and Gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Fœlix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrey, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrh and Frankincense is gathered: which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East-side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not onely plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratosthenes, In Persicæ oræ initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi uniones gignantur: in aliis verò, clari & perlucidi lapilli. Eratosthenes (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Persian Gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining Stones. Now, the difference between Sheba the Son of Raamah, and Seba the Son of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countreys and Habitations are divers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red-Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalm expounded Reges Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this sence: Reges Shebæ & Sabæ. Verse 7. Strabo. l. 16.

The

The Shebans, Ezekiel nameth together with the Edenites, becauſe they inhabited upon the Out-let of the ſame River, upon which the Edenites were ſeated: and ſo thoſe of Sheba, towards the Sea-Coaſt, and upon it, paſt up the Countrey, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joyned in one main ſtream, and ſo through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their Merchandiſe toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Channeh, border Eden on the Weſt and North-weſt, ſo doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-eaſt: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphraſt; which Countrey, by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews alſo often uſe.

Thus much of thoſe Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaſſar: for theſe Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had deſtroyed; and this place of Telaſſar lay moſt convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and alſo to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now, to make theſe things the more plain, we muſt remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death, theſe Monarchies were utterly diſ-joyned.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37. and in the ſecond of Kings, by the Threats of Rabſache, the while the Army of Aſſyria lay before Jeruſalem, that the Cities of Goſan, Haran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telaſſar, had reſiſted the Aſſyrians: though by them (in a ſort) maſtered and recovered. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have deſtroyed, as Goſan, and Haran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? But it appeared manifeſtly after Senacherib's death, that theſe Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others ſubjection: for Eſar-haddon held Aſſyria; and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabſache which lay before Jeruſalem (Hezekias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God deſtroyed; the King of Babel ſent to Hezekias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Aſſyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himſelf was ſlain by his own ſons in the Temple of his Idols, Eſar-Haddon ſucceeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian Ambaſſadours ſent by Merodach, Hezekias ſhewed all his Treaſures as well proper as conſecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conqueſt and ſubverſion. So as, the ſuſpition of War encreaſing between Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Aſſyria, were employed to bear off the incurſions of the Aſſyrians; and their Garriſon-place was at Telaſſar: and the very word (Telaſſar) ſaith Junius, ſignifying as much as a Bulwork againſt the Aſſyrians. This place Hireoſolymitanus takes for Reſem, others for Seleucia: but this Telaſſar is the ſame, which Am. Marcellinus in the Hiſtory of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Perſia) calleth Thilutha inſtead of Telaſſar, who deſcribeth the exceeding ſtrength thereof in his 24 Book: It is ſeated in an Iſland of Euphrates upon a ſteep and unaſſaultable Rock, in ſo much as the Emperour Julian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garriſon againſt the Aſſyrians, being alſo a paſſage out of Meſopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adjoyning were lodged to defend the ſame. This place Ptolomy calleth Teridata, having Reſeph which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand; and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence, is alſo found the City of Mann-Canne, upon Tygris; and all theſe ſeated together, as Iſaiah and Ezechiel have ſorted them. But the underſtanding of theſe places is the more difficult, becauſe Aſſyria (which the Chaldeans call Aturia) and Meſapotamia, were ſo often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominion. Aſſyria & Meſopotamia in Babyloniæ nomen tranſierunt (ſaith Niger,) Aſſyria and Meſopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, it appeareth by thoſe adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is ſeated, as, by Charran or Haran in Meſopotamia: alſo by Canneh and Reſeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in theſe words tranſlateth this place: Plantaverat autem JEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente; the Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eaſtward: that is (ſaith he in his Annotations) Juſſerat naſci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, finibus Arabæ & Meſopotamiæ; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eaſtern Region in the borders of Arabia and Meſopotamia.

SECT. X.

Of divers other teſtimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradiſe.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it ſeems by the two Epiſtles of the Neſtorian Chriſtians, that inhabit Meſopotamia: which Epiſtles in the year 1552 they ſent to the Pope about confirming their Patriarch, and Andræas Maſius hath publiſhed them, tranſlated out of Syriac into Latine. By theſe Epiſtles (I ſaid) it ſeems we may have ſome farther light for the proof of that, which we have ſaid about the Region of Eden in thoſe parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Iſland of Eden in the River Tygris, or at leaſt, Tygris in both theſe Epiſtles is called the River of Eden. This Iſland, as Maſius in his Preface to theſe Epiſtles ſaith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, The Iſland, by an eminency) It hath (ſaith he) ten miles in circuit, and was ſometimes walled round about, which name of the Iſland Eden may (doubtleſs) remain to this day; though in the reſt of the Region ſo called, this name be ſwallowed up with the fame of thoſe flouriſhing Kingdoms of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Iſland of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Haſan-Cepha, otherwiſe Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Moſal or Moſel, from which (as in that which followeth it ſhall appear out of Maſius) it is not above twelve miles diſtant. Neither is it to trouble us, That Moſal or Moſel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher up Tygris, in theſe words, Juxta autem Tygrim, Civitates ſunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Moſel dicitur; magne ſanè, &c. (that is) By Tygris are theſe Cities, Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus (which is now called Moſel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, diſplacing Moſel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I ſay) needs not here to trouble us: ſeeing for this matter, the teſtimony of Maſius, informed by the Chriſtians that dwelt there (the Seat of whoſe Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Moſal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, ſeated upon Tygris, and in the Neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Neſtorian Chriſtians in their former Epiſtle, call it Attur in theſe words:

Ex

Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ ſunt circum Civitatem Moſel (hoc eſt) Attur, in vicinia Nineves; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the City of Moſal (that is) Attur in the Neighbour-hood of Nineve. As alſo Niger acknowledgeth Cteſiphon a City thereabout to be called Aſſur, (which is the ſame as Attur, after the Dialect of thoſe Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he ſhould miſtake Cteſiphon, (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Aſſur. By this then we may come ſomewhat near the end of our purpoſe. For the Iſle of Eden, which lieth in the breaſt of Tygris, is but twelve miles from Moſal, and that antient City, which Ptolomy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philoſtratus, and Simeon Sethi, Moſula, and John Lean, Moſal, others Moſſe, (though it be not the ſame with Moſal) is ſet but a little higher upon the ſame River of Tygris, near Moſal: ſo that we are like to find this Iſle of Eden hereabout. For the ſame Andræas Maſius, which placeth it above Moſal, makes it to be below Haſan-Cepha, which is upon the ſame River of Tygris.

The only difficulty is this, that ſome perhaps may think, that the words of the Neſtorians, in both their Epiſtles, ſpeak not of any Iſle in Tygris, called the Iſle of Eden, but of an Iſle in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this ſence of their words in my opinion ſeemeth the more unprobable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a teſtimony from the Learned of thoſe parts, that not only Euphrates, but alſo Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in thoſe parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been ſubject to the ſame change, that all other Kingdoms of the World have been, and hath by conqueſt and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which ſtretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Flood called Shiner, and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that antient Æthicus maketh mention, (not that latter Æthicus, Diſciple of Gallinicus, otherwiſe by Plutarch and Athæneus called Iſtri, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Philadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the ſame being made Latine out of the Greek by Saint Hierom. And though by corruption of the antient Copy it be written, in Æthicus, Adonis, for Edenis: yet Adonis being a River of Phœnicia, cannot be underſtood to be the Region named by Æthicus. For Æthicus makes it a Countrey, and not a River, and joyneth it with Meſopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the Land of Chus Æthiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And laſtly, the River which watereth the Regions (ſaith Æthicus) falleth into the Gulf of Perſia: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name impoſed for the ſwiftneſs thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden; both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverſe Meſopotamia, Regions firſt of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained alſo ſome part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in ſome part thereof (ſaith Strabo) the leaves are alway green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Alſo Stephanus, de Urbibus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in uſe in Amos's time, though he ſpake not of Eden in the Eaſt, but of Eden in Celo-Syria. But to the end I may not burthen the Readers patience with too long a Diſcourſe, it may ſuffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyned together, and afterwards ſeparate) are two of thoſe four heads, into which theſe Rivers which are ſaid to water the Garden of Paradiſe, were divided: whoſe courſes being known, Eden (out of which they are ſaid to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath, were Tygris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Perath and Euphrates: & Hiddekel, Tygrim omnes exponunt; And all men underſtand Hiddekel by Tygris (ſaith Vatablus.) And becauſe that which I have ſaid of the Iſle of Eden ſhall not be ſubject to the cenſure of ſelf-invention, I have here-under ſet down the words out of the two general Epiſtles of the Neſtorians, as Maſius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occaſion of thoſe Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Neſtorian Chriſtians, which inhabit Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Perſia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at leaſt in Queen Marys time they had) fifteen Churches in one City called Seleucia Parthorum, or Moſel upon the River of Tygris; having no ſufficient Authority to chooſe themſelves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Biſhops at the leaſt) ſent to the Biſhop of Rome, in the year of Chriſt 1552. (as afore-ſaid) a Petition to obtain allowance unto ſuch Election, as themſelves had made: having three hundred years before that, upon the like defect, ſent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Biſhop of Rome the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in thoſe parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous deſire to enrich himſelf, had forborn to inſtitute Metripolitan Biſhops, when the places fell void) they all aſſembled themſelves together to conſult of the Church-government. And becauſe all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one Houſe and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Biſhop of the ſame ſtock and kindred, who aſpired to the ſame dignity which his Predeceſſors had held; the reſt of the profeſſors refuſed to allow him. Upon which occaſion, and for the choice of a Governour more ſufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches aſſembled themſelves. The words of the general Epiſtle to the Pope are theſe, about the middle of the ſaid Epiſtle; Verùm nos non acceptavimus, neq; proclamavimus ipſum; ſed ſubitò convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis quæ ſunt circum civitatem Moſel (hoc eſt, Attur) in vicini à Nineves, ex Babyloniâ, ex Charrâ, ex Arbelâ, ex Inſulâ quæ eſt in medio Tygris, fluminis Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but ſuddenly we aſſembled our ſelves out of all parts of the Eaſt, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Moſel (or Attur) neighbouring upon Nineve; and out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella; and out of the Iſland which lyeth in the middle of Tygris, a River of Eden, or rather out of the Iſle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a ſecond Epiſtle at the ſame time ſent, they uſed theſe words; Neq; ſuperſunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum eſt ordinare Catholicum; ſed ſoli pauci Epiſcopi, Epiſcopus Arbelæ, Epiſcopus Salmaſti, Epiſcopus Adurbeigan; en è veſtigio convenimus in Inſulam, quæ eſt intra Tygrim flumen, Eden; fecimuſq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Biſhops, to whom it belongs to ordain a Patriarch, but only a few Biſhops, as the Biſhop of Arbela, the Biſhop of Salmaſtius, and the Biſhop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we aſſembled ſpeedily in the Iſland of Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed between our ſelves, &c.

Now

Now this Iland of Eden, Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronitæ, and Cophti, he goeth on in these words; Mox, audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuariè in illam quam modo dixi Tygris Insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum sio ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & à paucis aliis quàm Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Iland of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Iland is situated about twelve miles above Mosal, containing very neer ten miles in compass, and every where invironed with a wall, inhabited by few other men then Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tygris; sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the City of Hassn-Ceipha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tygris Insulam, rupi asperæ impositam; Above the aforesaid Iland of Tygris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Iland of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Rivere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liveth; and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petræa, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Carran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which Traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) And lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

SECT. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

But it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith he, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur; Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads; Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the Narration and Explication of the place, if they be thus translated; And a River was going forth of Eden, (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tygurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius e rediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (Place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden it self.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written, Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herb that seedeth Seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees: And again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, instead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum; and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as, A River, (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the Objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth, for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha (by interpretation) Basilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Apamia; whence riseth the name of Pasi-Tygris, as it were Piso-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nahar-sares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: This Gehon leadeth to the first Seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilius, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Assyria proprie dicta; whose chief City was Nineveh, as in Genesis the Tenth it is written, That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineveh, which was the chief City of Assur.

River

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Ulpianus) illud est, unde aqua noscitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main stream, called the head of the River.

SECT. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soyl, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was; which, if it be denied, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any Plant thereon growing, that they had before the Floud; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self; for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles, or thereabout, from Nineveh, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tygrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Nini sita erat. Hæc Regio, omnium quas nos videmus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cereris autem fructu procreando adeò ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheat and Barley, being almost four fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Countrey of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Countrey Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

Herod. Clia. l. 1.

To this Palm-Tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fifth commodity, not inferiour to any of those four, which is, that from this self same Tree, there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East-India they prepare the Cordage for their Ships. And that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made there from the Eremite himself, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees which the East Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yieldeth no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem Regionem palmæ sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place, Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte læva Arabiæ (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interest, inter Tygrim & Euphratem jacens, tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champain Countrey placed between Tygris and Euphrates, of so fruitfull and fat a soil, that they are said to drive their Cattel from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonii secant; The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northern parts; so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Sun's neighbour, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetual activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fourty years, could not make our kind of Wheat bear seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soil, That the second year, the very stubble (or rather falling down of the seeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Ubertatis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges.

Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 18. c. 17.

SECT. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFter the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me; seeing necessity it self (Tygris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris; or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which River or Rivers, Moses witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the World, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant as any of same known or discovered in the World: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches; and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no errour which hath not some slippery and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who study to be singular) find out (straining Reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the World matter of contention and jangling; not doubting, but in the variable deformity of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia, afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tygris, took name from Havilah the Son of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the Son of Joctan; the one remembred by Moses in the discription of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generations of Noah, and his Sons after the Floud. For the
Gen. 10. 7. Sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah and Raamah; and the Sons of Joctan were Ophir, and Havilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Joctan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Solomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had their names. Now, because Ganges is a great and a famous River
Gen. 10. 29. of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which River is said by Moses,
Gen. 2. 11. to water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps, it was supposed, that those four Rivers named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous River after Tygris and Euphrates) they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nearness, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be of the four heads, seeing Indus cometh between it and Tygris? and between Tygris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdoms. And again, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tygris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much less Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little less than fourty degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoever readeth the Story of Alexander, shall find that there is no River in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himself, and the greatest part of his Army, and in sailing down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suastus, Acesines, Adris (otherwise Hirotis,) Hispalis, and Zaradui, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the Ocean Sea.

But because Pison, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must somewhere be Gen. 2. 13. joyned with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other be Ganges, or Nilus: For Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterrane Sea, and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indean Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the same Armenia, by the Georgian Mountains; so as Ganges, who only travaileth in her own India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, never saw the land of Eden, or joyned themselves in one channel, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moses.

Therefore the River Pison, which inricheth Havilah, is the same which by joyning it self with Tygris, was therefore called Pisi-Tygris or Piso-Tygris, of Pison and Tygris, which River watereth that Havilah, Gen. 2. 9. 12. which Havilah the son of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bigness of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain Gum sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Loadstone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth Pearl: so doth Eugubinus; and Hierom calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a Tree bearing Gum or Pearl, Havilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Susiana or Havilah, stretcheth it self towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of Gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Pison was Danubius: Strab. the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pison into Nilus: Hopk. de Par. But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellespont, and all Asia the less between it and Tygris. Now Pison, which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retain some signe of this name, for where it and Tygris embraceth each other under the City of Apamia, there do they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piso-Tygris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it self, which dwelleth so near these Polit. Cosmog. Rivers, is by some writers known by the name of Banmag-das, as, by Postellus: by Castaldus, of Balduch: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Bonghedar, by Andrew Thevet; Thevet. and yet all those that have lately seen it, call it Bag- Cosmog. det. To this River of Pison Ptolemy indeed with many Asiæ tab. 4 others give the name of Basilius or Regius, and Gehon they term Maharsares, and Marsias, and Baarsares. So Plin. lib. is Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo 5. c. 24. and Pliny called Pixirates: by Junius, Puck-perah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath (saith Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Josephus, Phorah; Eusebius, Zosimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gistilianus and Colinutius, term it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Assyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tygris, as Diglito and Diglath, Seilax and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants, Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tygris (saith he) stream into four branches; two of which keep their antient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason why these two Rivers, joyned in one (below Apamia,) lose their names and are called Pisi-Tygris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channel of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not entirely into the Persian Sea, as Tygris, accompanied with Pison, doth.

This errour, That Pison was Ganges, was first broached by Josephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authourity to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For, Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierom, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa to compass Æthiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoyning to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Æthiopia) fastned to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon men the transportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the Son of Ham first sate down with his Sons Sheba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. And of Havilah, the Son of Cush did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the Land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the Sons of Jectan, Ophir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the Sons of Cush in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah, or Chavilah, was first Chusea, of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Havilah unto the Desarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possess all the interjacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red-Sea. 1 Sam. 15. 7. But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red-Sea, to Havilah in the East India, for Saul was no such Travailer or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah must be found nearer home, where the Sons of Ismael inhabited, and which Country Saul wasted: for Amalek and the Amalekites possess'd that neck of Country, between the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea, Havilah being the extream of the one, towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the East-part, or backside of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petræa, and Deserta.

SECT. XIV.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, 2. Chron. 21. 16.

NOw as Havilah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Grecks, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopians are, as much as black or burntfaces, whose proper Country called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Ethiopians, and far South in Africa; yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very near, or else directly under the Equinoctial line, which is very far from this Land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia. See more of this point c. 7. Sect. 10.

Now, if it be granted, that Chush, and the Land of the Chushites be that Tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit Ismael ab Havilah usque Sur, quæ respicit Ægyptum introeuntibus Assyrios, Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River that Watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Country bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lieth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ishmael (where there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten Hundred thousand against Asa King of Juda. Which Army came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a strange progress for such a multitude, as ten Hundred thousand, having so mighty a King as the King of Egypt, between Palestina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this World of an Armie, he in following his Victory took some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now, that Gerar is a City of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the Scripture disproving it: And Abraham departed thence, toward the South Countrey, and dwelt between Kadesh and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet after they passed the Red-Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the Story of Isaac it is written: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and and the Philiſtines were no Æthiopians. And laſtly, Moſes himſelf, where he deſcribeth the bounds of Canaan, hath theſe words; Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comeſt to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howſoever Pererius doth, with an honeſt excuſe, ſalve this Tranſlation of Chus for Æthiopia; yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Joſephus did altogether miſ-underſtand this place. And firſt, for Homer's Eaſt and Weſt Æthiopia, they are both found elſewhere: For Pliny in his fifth Book, and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of theſe two Æthiopia's. But the Eaſt Æthiopia is that which compaſſeth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abiſſines under Preſter John; And the Weſt Æthiopia is that which joyneth it ſelf with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are theſe Æthiopians called Perorſi, Dararites, with divers other names, which Pliny numbreth. But all theſe are in Africa, and beyond the Deſarts thereof, ſaith Pliny out of Homer, Agrippa and Juba; which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Preſter John, and the Troglodites) lie due Eaſt and Weſt. But as for Cuſh, and the Region of the Iſmaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Joſephus was exceeding groſs herein, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Moſes when he ſerved Pharaoh, in the Wars againſt the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he tranſporteth Madian by miracle over the Red-Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and ſetteth it in Æthiopia, as ſhall be ſhewed more at large in the Chapter of the World's Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly tranſlated Nilus, Pererius confeſſeth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copy, than otherwiſe. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie; And what haſt thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? To this ſaith Pererius, profectò Hebraicè ibi non eſt vox Gehon, ſed Sichor, quæ ſignificat Nigrum & turbidum: Truly (ſaith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor; which ſignifieth black and troubled water.

C. 2. v. 18.

Furthermore, this is a manifeſt and unanſwerable Argument, That Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moſes married the Daughter of Jethro, Prince and Prieſt of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopiſſan, as (with Joſephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a Marginal Note. Now it is without diſpute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petræa, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the ſecond of Exodus, that Moſes fled from Pharaoh into the Land of Midian, and ſate down by a Well, &c. And again, in the third of Exodus; When Moſes kept the Sheep of Jethro, his Father-in-law, Prieſt of Madian, &c. Indeed, theſe four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, becauſe they dwell confuſedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Iſmaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chuſites, which were all, in one general word, Arabians; and in the Scriptures ſometimes called by one of theſe names, and ſometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27, 28. that Joſeph was ſold to the Iſmaelites; and in the ſame Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites ſold Joſeph to Potiphar, Pharaoh's Steward. The Genevians, in a Marginal Note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) ſay, that Moſes wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Iſmaelites to be all one. But Moſes wrote not after any man's opinion, he wrote the truth; and theſe were all Arabians: and ſo in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandiſe, which they brought with them, when they bought Joſeph: for their Camels were loaden with Spicerie, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the Trades of Arabia Fœlix: from whence chiefly, and from the Eaſt India, all the World is ſerved with Myrrhe and Frankincenſe; and their Spices they received from the Eaſt ſide of the Arabian Gulf, as aforeſaid. And in the 39. Chapter, it is ſaid, That Potiphar bought Joſeph of the Iſmaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphraſt in the ſame place calleth Arabians. Now to make this the more manifeſt, it is written, Judg. 6. That when Iſrael had ſown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the Eaſt, and came upon them: They of the Eaſt were Arabians of the Deſart; ſo as where before in the buying of Joſeph, the Madianites and the Iſmaelites were confuſed, here the Madianites and the Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the proſecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the Eighth Chapter, verſ. 24. theſe Nations are called Iſmaelites, and neither Madianites, nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon deſired that every man would give him the golden Ear-Rings, which they had taken after the Victory againſt Zeba and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700 ſhekels of Gold, it is written; For they had golden Ear-Rings, becauſe they were Iſmaelites. And theſe Iſmaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (ſaith God, of Iſmael) ſhall be againſt all men, and every man's hand againſt him. Of theſe Iſmaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though ſome Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenitæ. And theſe Iſmaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Deſarts of Sur and Pharan (ſaith Joſephus) uſe poyſon upon their Arrows, as the Indians do. Toward the South-Eaſt are the Madianites, and Chuſites: and beyond them towards the Deſarts of Arabia, the Amalekites, and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Gen. 16. 12.

Laſtly, The ill Tranſlation of Æthiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made moſt apparent in the ſecond of Chronicles, in theſe words: So the Lord ſtirred up againſt Jehoram the ſpirit of the Philiſtines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; ſo Hierome reads it: The Geneva Tranſlation hath it, Which were beſides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off between the Philiſtines and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philiſtines and Arabians do mix and joyn with the Land of the Chuſites, and are diſtant from Æthiopia about 32. or 33. degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Deſart of Sur and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the ſecond of Chronicles, ſhould have been tranſlated in theſe words; So the Lord ſtirred up againſt Jehoram, the ſpirits of the Philiſtines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chuſites, who indeed are their next Neighbours. * Nulla ſupereſt dubitatio quin Æthiopia in ſacris literis ſit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (ſaith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey which joyneth to Arabia.

2 Chro. 21. 16.

* Steuch. Eugub. in Gen. c. 2.

Now, may we think, is it probable, or poſſible, that Moſes could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man ſo well, and therefore would never have named Gehon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moſes had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was caſt upon Reeds, and preſerved by God, working compaſſion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a River of Egypt, wherein wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had derided them: for they had lived there all days of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof, except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives instead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Isaiah, and once in the Prophet Jeremy; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence or trade beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or Heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlo-Syrians, with the Magogians, Tubalites, and others their adherents. And thirdly, within themselves, the Nations which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-Coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others; yea, Jerusalem it self was with-held from Israel, from the days of Moses, even unto the time of David, by the Jebusites.

Plin. l. 5. c. 1. c. 23. v. 3. c. 2. v. 18.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the Stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was, that Matt. Beroaldus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I find none such In rerum Natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon Nilus; so where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly, this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterrane at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth far East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza, is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red-Sea, whose head from Gaza it self is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near Neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and Plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children never rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his Sons, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tygris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia Felix. Nimrod seated himself in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth in the Lakes of Chaldæa; and in process of time, and as their People increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now, because there could be no such River found in Arabia the Stony, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Æthiopia; and Gehon, Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after-Ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River of Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered; shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spain, Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should, or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit; seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the World. For, though the Babylonian Empire which took beginning in Nimrod the Son of Chus, consisted at the first but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne; yet we find, that his Successours within a few years after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memory of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatness of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger Son, obscured the name and Nation of his Father Cush in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soil and Territory, by themselvess afterward inhabited and held. And we may not think, that Chus, or any of his, could in hast creep through those desart Regions, which the length of 130. years after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reed and Tree, to joyn themselves (as it were) into one main Body and Forrest. For if we look with judgment and reason into the Worlds Plantation, we shall find, that every Family seated themselves as near together as possibly they could; and though necessity enforced them, after they grew full of People, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar, or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort and succour one another by River, the Fields being then (without all doubt) impassible. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, sate down in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was, to which the greatest troops of Noah's Children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increase. The first Father of men, Adam, had therein his former habitation: The second Father of Mankind, Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choyce of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tygris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Havilah place himself upon Piso-Tygris; Raamah and his Son Sheba farther down upon the same River, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chush himself upon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Charran, Reseph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded upon these Navigable Rivers, or their branches; by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembred.

SECT. XV.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

But now to conclude this Dispute; It appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scripture, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram juviorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other (to wit) 35. degrees from the Æquinoctial, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate, the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyl, Grain of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palm-Trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein soever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can most vaunt that they have excelled; yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggeth at Nature's hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West-Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer; yet, lay down by those pleasures and benefits, the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earth-quakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison between one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for man's ingratitude and cruelty) cursed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may safely think, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Universal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, and of Knowledge; Plants only proper and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so grand a Lord.

The sum of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have been dim-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our known World: some, above the middle Region of the Air: some, elevated near the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Air, and in mens fancies vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses;) Eastward in respect of Judea, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tygris and Euphrates swimming through Eden do joyn in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses, the true seats of Chus and his sons being then in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility; and this River is a greater stranger to Tygris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almost as far off as the Cape of Good hope, and falleth into the Mediterrane Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North; the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following, I have added a Chorographical description of this Terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

SECT. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree; and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

FOr eating the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, was Adam driven out of Paradise, In exilium vitæ temporalis, Into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile as nothing can fix them, and so slippery as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World, an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a Plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own dayes, but also given a dureful continuance to all his posterity; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

Som. Sept. 2. li. 174.

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his Creatures; Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And, as before the Flood the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the Flood of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed God's first and easie Commandment, the lives of men on Earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first Age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adam's fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite Wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the Earth could not have contained Mankind; or else, that millions of Souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: And therefore that of Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a meer Allegorie; taking their strength out of Solomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life; as out of the Apocalypse, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustine's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a Terrestrial Paradise, so there was a Celestial. For although Agar and Sarah were Figures of the Old and New Testament; yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer foolishness. And so in this place, the sense of the Scripture is manifest; For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to the sight, and sweet to the taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: Which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by God's commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiod, Homer, Ovid, and others, steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they took the Platform of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young; and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the gods.

Apocal. 2. 7.

SECT. II.

Of Becanus his Opinion, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOw, for the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at, whereat Goropius much marvelled. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely, howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Mabugensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part, and fol. 48. saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-tree; of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acesines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies, in or near the Kingdom of Porus.

This

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigneſs of a great Peaze, or (as Pliny reporteth) ſomewhat bigger; and that it is a Tree, Se ſemper ſerens, Alwayes planting it ſelf; that it ſpreadeth it ſelf ſo far abroad, as that a troop of Horſe-men may hide themſelves under it. Strabo ſaith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no leſs than a ſhield. Ariſtobulus affirmeth, that fifty Horſe-men may ſhadow themſelves under one of theſe Trees. Oneſicritus raiſeth this number to four hundred. This Tree (ſaith Theophraſtus) exceeded all other in bigneſs, which alſo Pliny and Oneſicritus confirm: to the trunk of which, theſe Authors give ſuch a magnitude, as I ſhame to repeat. But it may be, they all ſpeak by an ill-underſtood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not ſo rare a Plant as Becanus conceiveth, who, becauſe he found it no where elſe, would needs draw the Garden of Paradiſe to the Tree, and ſet it by the River Aceſines. But many parts of the World have them, and I my ſelf have ſeen twenty thouſand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moiſt grounds, and in this manner: After they are firſt ſhot up ſome twenty or thirty foot in length (ſome more, ſome leſs, according to the ſoil) they ſpread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or ſtem: for from the utmoſt end of the head-branches, there iſſueth out a Gummy juyce which hangeth downward like a cord or ſinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no ſooner toucheth, but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it ſelf a Tree exceeding haſtily. From the utmoſt boughs of theſe young Trees, there fall again the like cords, which in one year and leſs (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become alſo Trees of the bigneſs of the neather part of a Lance, and as ſtreight as Art or Nature can make any thing, caſting ſuch a ſhade, and making ſuch a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the World can do. Now, one of theſe Trees conſidered, with all his young ones, may (indeed) ſhroud four hundred or four thouſand Horſe-men, if they pleaſe; for they cover whole Valleys of ground where theſe Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thouſands in the parts of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, ſhooting alway downward to find root under water, are, in thoſe Seas of the Indies where Oyſters breed, intangled in their beds, ſo as by pulling up one of theſe cords out of the Sea, I have ſeen five hundred Oyſters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, That Oyſters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any ſuch huge leaves, or any ſuch delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus: This Tree (ſaith he) was good for meat, and pleaſing to the ſight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil is deſcribed to be.

Plin. l. 11. c. 3.

Lib. 1. cap. 2.

Secondly, This Tree having ſo huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themſelves from the preſence of God; for no other Tree (ſaith he) could contain them. But firſt it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or ſtem: for among ten thouſand of them, it is hard to find any one bigger than the reſt, and theſe are all of a mean ſize. Secondly, the words of Moſes tranſlated, In medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters underſtood in the plural number (that is) in the midſt of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moſes Bar-Cephas) word for word, is, That when Adam and Eve found themſelves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it ſelf was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew near it: becauſe Adam being poſſeſs'd with ſhame, did not run up and down the Garden to ſeek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it ſelf; and theſe leaves of all other were the moſt commodious, by reaſon of their largeneſs; which Pliny avoweth in theſe words; Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazoniæ habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the ſhape of an Amazonian ſhield: which alſo Theophraſt confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Gen. 3. 7.

Plin. l. 12. c. 5.

Ducit Amazonium lunatis agmina peltis
Penthesilæa furens.

Virg. Æn. l. 1. 494.

The Amazons with Creſcent-formed ſhield
Penthesilæa leads into the field.

Here Becanus deſireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed diſcovery, uſing this confident (or rather cholerick) ſpeech: Quis erit tam impudenter obſtinatus, ſi hæc à nobis, de ficu hac, ex antiquis ſcriptoribus cum Moiſis narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere, Aliam arborem inveniri poſſe, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be ſo impudently obſtinate, if he compare theſe things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moſes, as to dare to avow, That any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly anſwer, or agree therewith? But for my ſelf, becauſe I neither find this Tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſs of leaves, nor in fruit to this report; I rather encline to the opinion of Philo, That the Earth never brought forth any of theſe Trees, neither before nor after. But I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind; onely thereby, and by the eaſie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleaſed God to make trial of his obedience: Prohibita non propter aliud quam ad commendandum puræ ac ſimplicis obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other reſpect, than thereby to commend the goodneſs of pure and ſimple Obedience.

SECT. III.

Of Becanus his not-unwitty allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

But in this I muſt do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his ſuppoſition of the Tree it ſelf to be true. The effects whereof, becauſe his diſcourſes are exceeding ample, I have gathered in theſe few words. As this Tree (ſaith he) ſo did Man grow ſtraight and upright towards God, until ſuch time as he had tranſgreſſed and broken the Commandment of his Creatour; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree, he began to bend downward, and ſtooped toward the Earth, which all the reſt of Adam's Poſterity after him have done, rooting themſelves therein, and faſtning themſelves to this corrupt World. The exceeding umbragiouſneſs of this Tree, he compareth to the dark and ſhadowed life of man, through which the Sun of Juſtice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the ſhadow of death, till it pleaſed Chriſt to climb the Tree of the Croſs for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived Knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the World most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bittrest sorrows and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little; in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shews, and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigness of the smallest peaze; glory, to all the World apparent; goodness, to all the World invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly ability surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such Men, and such Trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or poorest and basest Man, then such a flourishing stately ness, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedness and shame, sought for leaves to cover himself withal: this may serve to put us in mind of his and our sins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

SECT. IV.

Of the names of the Tree of Knowledg of Good and Evil: with some other Notes touching the Story of Adam's sin.

NOw, as touching the sense of this Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the first fruit thereof had, and as touching the property of the Tree it self, Moses Bar-Cephas, an ancient Syrian-Doctor (translated by Masius) giveth this judgment: That the fruit of this Tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth: Arbor scientiæ boni & mali (id est) experientiæ boni & mali ab eventu. The Tree of Knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of God's own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or Spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of God's Commandment was the fearfullest Evil, and the observation of his Precepts the happiest Good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himself another terrour than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glass of his own guilty soul, he beheld therein the horrour of God's Judgments; so as he then knew, (he feelingly knew) and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be express'd. He then saw himself naked both in Body and mind, that is, deprived of God's grace and former felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation by any self quality or effect: for the same Phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heap of Stones called the Heap of witness, between Jacob and Laban; not that the Stones bare witness, but for a memory of the Covenant. So Jacob called the House of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desart, Viventis, & videntis. Num. 20. 13 Gen. 26. 20, 21. Cap. 31. 48. Cap. 28. 19. Cap. 16. 14.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affection, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceived in himself, and looking but slightly (as all his issue do) into the miseries and sorrows incident; and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtain by tasting the fruit forbidden: he was transported and blown forward, by the gentle wind of pleasing perswasions, unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

But what means did the Devil find out, or what instruments did his own subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; so as by Adam's hearkning to the voice of his Wife, contrary to the express Commandement of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being to man for a comfort and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (said God himself) Cursed is the Earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts into whom the Devil entred and perswaded. Ben. Sim. 2. l. 2. Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting for her knowledg; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yield to her perswasions? Even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namely, an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the Son of David, God's chosen servant, and himself a man endued with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other men in succeeding Ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the perswasions of their Wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.

Of divers memorable things, between the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

SECT. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cain's sin: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possess'd Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater then he could bear; For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place, Moses giveth a reason: for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men onely, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murther of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in cœlo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven (saith David) thou art there; if in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exiit à facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord; (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

SECT. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierom and many others understand to signifie wandring, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else; and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now, that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an Abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortify himself against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jews; and that as Cain after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thence-forth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain Estate, Common-weal, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now, this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of the Nomades; but Arabia the Desart is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of Tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemy, Calena; which also might be derived of Carena, the Countrey of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East-side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do signifie profugus, that is, a Fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, then till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he enclosed, either for his own defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as, for mine own opinion, I am resolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word Vagabond) which Cain useth himself, it seemeth by the perclose of

of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: For whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Henoch; were the first society and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these People (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in memory of Noah and his Sons: so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those People, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self, where Henoch stood before the Flood, and whereof Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place, to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Sogdiana, and Bactria; of the same name many Mountains, as those which are otherwise call'd Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over, or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith satisfie our selves, if of so great, and almost worn-out Antiquity, of the eldest Peoples names and nations, there remain any Print or foot-steps to Posterity.

Quotidiè aliquid in hoc magno orbe mutatur: nova urbium fundamenta jaciuntur, nova Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus prioribus) oriuntur. Senec. ad Albinum.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochei, described, though diversly written: as in Pliny, sometimes Henochii; in Mela, Enochii; in Flaccus, Heniochi; in Lucan, Eniochi: All which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometimes he useth the word East or South without borrowing or addition; at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward, or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh, he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain, he addeth the word (towards) as, in the land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two, either to the North, or to the South of the East.

Verse 2.

But, as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Henoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was re-peopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoyning, were not the first of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomy, Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward, he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he again discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountains of Paro-panisus; between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

Plin. l. 6. c. 4, 5. Ptol. tab. Asiæ. 3.

And although we cannot be assured that these Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Annius the Frier, who sets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden, being directly West.

And besides these several Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Onely the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which which signifieth Cart or Coach-men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the interprize of Jason; into Colchis. And though I do not deny, but that Jason, with other Greeks, ranged the coasts of Asia the less, in an open Boat or kind of small Gally, * of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no man doubted but that the tale of the golden Fleece was for the most part Poetical; and withal, that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their own Rowers, being fifty four, there was no place, and less use, of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

SECT. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

But of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Henoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice: Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the 4 and 5 Chapter of Genesis: against which, for the first, it is demanded, How it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Henoch) to to perform such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which lasted, by the least account, 1656. years, in five short Chapters: Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest Reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generation of mens lives so long a measure as 800. and 900. years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soever: for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues, Moses had the least care. And as it is said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required, is to be understood: which advice, seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos, or à fine dierum, (that is) in process of time, it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years foregone, and when his people were increaſed, he built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, ſo of Solomon, that he built the Temple of Jeruſalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he imployed in that Work 150000. labourers: for this
2 *King.*16. phraſe or ſpeech is common with our ſelves to ſay, the King invaded, when he cauſed an invaſion to be made: and he built, when he commanded ſuch a building. And therefore ſeeing that we find that Moſes had no regard to the Ages, Birth or Death of Cain's Iſſues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he alſo paſſeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumſtance: for of Cain,
*Gen.*4.17. Moſes writeth in this manner; Cain alſo knew his Wife, who conceived and bare Henoch, and he built a
18. City, and called the name of the City after the name of his Son Henoch. And to Henoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Mehujael, and Mehujael begat Methuſael, and Methuſael Lamech.

Now, of Seth, Moſes writeth far otherwiſe, and in this manner: And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat
C. 5. *v.*5. Enoch eight hundred and ſeven years, and begat Sons and Daughters: ſo as all the dayes of Seth were Nine hundred and twelve years, and he dyed: As for the years and times of the wicked, they were not numbred in Libro viventium, ſaith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God eſtabliſhed; from whom Chriſt deſcended, as touching his Manhood: and therefore this way and work Moſes walked in, and finiſhed it with care, paſſing over the reprobate Generation, (as aforeſaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moſes remembreth but Eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth, ten, counting Adam alſo therein, as followeth.

I. ADAM.

2 Cain.	7 Lamech, who by Adah had
3 Henoch.	8 Jubal, and Tubal; and by Silla, Tubal-Cain and Noema.
4 Irad.
5 Mehujael.
6 Methuſael.

I. ADAM.

2 Seth.	7 Henoch.
3 Enoſh.	8 Methuſalem.
4 Cainan.	9 Lamech, and
5 Mahaleel.	10 Noah.
6 Jared.

Theſe be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Joſephus giveth unto Lamech Threeſcore and ſeventeen Sons and Daughters, by his two Wives, Ada and Sylla: and to theſe three Sons of Lamech, Moſes aſcribeth the invention of Paſtorage, of Muſick, and the working in Metal; for it ſeemeth that Jubal firſt gathered together, and made familiar thoſe beaſts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Droves:
*Gen.*4.20, 21, 22. Tubal invented Muſick, and Tubal-Cain the working in Braſs and Iron: the one being addicted to Huſbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleneſs and pleaſure. In whom began theſe three meaner degrees, of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Muſicians. And in the iſſues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Aſtronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

SECT. IV.

Of the diverſities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second ſcruple hath been made, How it came to paſs that the Patriarchs begat their Children at ſo divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at ſeventy years, Mahaleel and Enoch at Threeſcore and five years, whereas Jared begat not any of his untill he was 162 years old: Methuſalem begat at 187; Lamech at 182, and Noah at 500 years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, becauſe it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methuſalem, or Lamech abſtained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abſtinence, ſeeing that Enoch who was Tranſlated by God for his ſingular Sanctity, begat Children before he was Threeſcore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariſeth in this, that Moſes did not number the Generations before the Floud preciſely, according to the firſt-begotten and eldeſt Sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Anceſtours, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldeſt of Jared, nor Lamech the firſt-born of Methuſalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though theſe three were onely named, and ſurviving, and which by God were reſerved to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at Threeſcore and ten years, who was the firſt Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methuſalem begat Lamech in the One hundred and eighty ſeventh year of his life, the difference ſeemeth ſtrange, where Lamech is taken for the eldeſt. But Moſes rejecteth all the other Sons of Methuſalem but Lamech onely, becauſe he was the Father of Noah, as aforeſaid. Of this Saint Auguſtine hath ſomewhat elſe in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moſes counted the Generations of the firſt Age, and ſo to Abraham, and the children of the promiſe after him; ſo doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Chriſt, not by the eldeſt Sons, but from thoſe whom God had choſen and bleſſed, without reſpect of the firſt-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Eſtates, worldly and tranſitory only; and therefore the Evangeliſt nameth Iſaac, and not Iſmael, Mat. 1. 2. though Iſmael were firſt in time: ſo doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Eſau the elder; neither is Chriſt derived from any of the three eldeſt Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and ſo from David a younger Son of Jeſſai; and laſtly, we find, that the Kingdom it ſelf of Juda was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Solomon. 1 Kings 2.

SECT. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and ſome of late memory.

THe third Objection is, that the great difference of years between thoſe of the firſt Age, whereof ſome of them had well neer ſeen a thouſand years, makes it diſputable, whether the account of times were of the ſame meaſure as in after-Ages, ſeeing that that soon after the Flood, men lived not a third part of that time; and in succeeding Ages, and to this day, not the tenth.

Sol. Pol. hist. c. 3. Macrob. Satur. lib. 1. cap. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

They that have hereon resolved that those years were but Lunary years (to wit) of a month or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the year of his life an hundred and five, if those years be taken but for moneths, then had Seth lived but eight years and one moneth when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have been but six years and fourty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at six, seven, or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the Workmanship of God's hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the World, had length of daies, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of Nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of Fourscore and ten and odd years; which were not only less by far then the Patriarchs lived after the Floud, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourscore, and some an hundred years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former accompt were of Lunary years) makes but seventeen and an half of our years.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength, or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt; which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God, for the cruelty of man's heart, brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Floud infused such an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weakness, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so Time it self (under the deathful shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that lively virtue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and cleansed matter, shall wax old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferiour Creatures, who by the Ordinance of God receive operative Virtue from the superiour.

Psal. 102. v. 26.

But besides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time? The tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dugge; an unnatural curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurses, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her self hath not yet any root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-ripe seeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxuriousness of this gluttonous Age, wherein we press Nature with over-weighty burthens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these Elegant Verses:

Pharsal. 4.

——O Prodiga rerum
Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta paratu;
Et quæsitorum terra pelagoque ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & lautæ gloria mensæ,
Discite quàm parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum natura petat.
Non auro myrrhâque bibunt: sed gurgite puro
Vita redit: satis est populis, fluviusque, Cereque.

O wastful Riot never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent;
Vain-glory of a Table sumptuous,
Learn with how little life may be preserved.
In Gold and Myrrh they need not to carouse,
But with the Brook the peoples thirst is served;
Who fed with Bread and Water are not sterved.

Pier. Hieroglyph. l. 2.

The Egyptians affirm, that the longest time of man's life is an hundred years, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Berosus to an hundred and seventeen years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number, and review of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) four and fifty persons of an hundred years of age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two of an hundred and five and twenty: four of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or an hundred and seven and thirty years old: and last of all, three men of an hundred and fourty: and this search was made in the times of Vespatian the Father, and the Son.

Plin. l. 7. c. 29.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Essæans, gave them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persian Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm out of Homer, that Nestor lived three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the less Asia, little less: Also Masanissa of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (saith Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them lived full two hundred years; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself; as Marethon, Berosus, Mochus, Estius, Hieronymus, Egyptius Hecatæus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, General of the Turks Army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my self knew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589. and many years since, who was married in Edward the fourth's time, and held her Joynture from all the Earls of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness:

Stroz-

Strozzius Sicogna, out of Torquemada, Maffeus, and the like Authors, telleth of ſome that have not onely far exceeded the term preſcribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered eſtate of decrepit age to freſh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in thoſe days wherein Galen the Phyſitian lived, it may eaſily prove unto us, what Reeds we are in reſpect of thoſe Cedars of the firſt Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Blood ſix pound weight, whereas we (for the moſt part) ſtop at ſix ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Conſtellations) which are the natural cauſes of a long and healthful life; (to wit) ſtrong Parents, a pure and thin Air, and temperate uſe of diet, pleaſure, and reſt: for thoſe which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring ſtone, cannot ſtand long upright; on Air we feed always and in every inſtant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppreſs and overcharge Nature, maketh her to ſink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good conſtitution, a pure Air, and a temperate uſe of thoſe things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

SECT. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch Writ before the Flood.

A Fourth ſcruple hath been made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moſes, ſeeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any ſuch had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity periſhed in the Univerſal Flood.

But if we conſider the curioſity and policy of elder Ages, we ſhall find, that knowledge was the greateſt treaſure that men ſought for, and which they alſo covered and hid from the vulgar ſort, as Jewels of inеſtimable price, fearing the irreverent conſtruction of the ignorant and irreligious: ſo as whatſoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the ſame was not left to publick diſpute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wiſe men to a poſterity equally Zealous; Ex animo in animum ſine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From mind to mind without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. Dion. Arcop. And it was thought by Eſdras, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moſes did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal, ſecretiorem & veram leges enarrationem; a more ſecret and true explanation of the Law; which (ſaith he, out of the ſame Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Joſhua, and Joſhua to the Elders: for, to teach theſe myſteries, which he called ſecretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare ſanctum canibus, & inter porcos ſpargere Margaritas; then to give holy things to Dogs, and to caſt Pearls before Swine. Fol. 18. In ſucceeding times this underſtanding and wiſdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and letters bearing the form of Beaſts, Birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to ſuch as ſerved in their Temples, and to their Kings and Prieſts. Of the firſt the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is aſcribed to Zoroaſter, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falſely.

Cabala eſt ſcientia Theologiæ non revelata. P. M. 83. Miran. 110. ſol. This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is Receptio in Latine, and a Receiving in Engliſh. And this cuſtome was alſo held by the Druids and Bards of our antient Brittains, and of latter times by the Iriſh Chroniclers called Rimers. If then ſuch as would ſeem wiſeſt in the uſe of reaſon, will not acknowledge, that the ſtory of the Creation or beginning of all things, was written by inſpiration, the Holy-Ghoſt guiding the hand of Moſes; yet it is manifeſt, that the knowledge thereof might by Tradition (then uſed) be delivered unto him by a more certain preſumption, than any or all the teſtimonies which prophane antiquity had preſerved and left to their ſucceſſors: which their wiſe men (as they term them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam inſtructed Seth, and Seth his Children and Succeſſors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifeſt, that Methuſalem lived together with Adam himſelf two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methuſalem no leſs than five hundred years: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledge by an eaſie and ordinary way might come to Iſrael, and ſo to Moſes.

But beſides this Tradition, it is queſtionleſs, that the uſe of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by thoſe Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch: of which Joſephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike ſome ruine or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are aſcribed to Seth. But of theſe Prophecies of Enoch, St. Jude teſtifieth; and ſome part of his Books (which contained the courſe of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (ſaith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had ſeen, and read ſome whole Pages. It is not therefore ſtrange, that Moſes came to the knowledge of the Creation, and ſtory of the firſt Age, ſeeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letter, had not the ſpirit of God inſtructed and inſpired him as it did: which alſo his many and ſtrange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifeſt.

Joſ. l. 1. Jude Ep. v. 14. Origen Homil. 1. in Numb.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howſoever ſome men make mention of them, ſure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Auguſtine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten Traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelaſius among other the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not theſe of Enoch; but that whatſoever was remembred out of them, the ſame was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius, that ſuch a Book there was, and that the ſame was corrupted after the death of the Apoſtles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occaſion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moſes, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greateſt arguments againſt theſe Books, is, that neither Philo nor Joſephus (the moſt diligent ſearchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But againſt it I will ſet this opinion of St. Auguſtine, Scripſiſſe quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum ſeptimum ab Adam, negare non poſſumus: That Enoch the ſeventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were ſuſpected becauſe of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, ſuppoſed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by ſo much the more, becauſe no ſuch Book was found amongſt thoſe Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Prieſts in Armario Judaico (ſaith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth, that this Book might be preſerved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the Propheſies

Propheſies remembred by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to poſterity, I know not; whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the ſame is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge aſcribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Stars; and afterwards to ſome of his Sons, to Zoroaſter, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had ſeen and might preſerve this book. For it is not likely, that ſo exquiſite knowledge therein (as theſe men had) was ſuddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been ſaid before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methuſalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah; it is not ſtrange (I ſay) to conceive how Moſes came to the knowledge of the firſt Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof then ſelf-authority.

Heb. 11. 15.

SECT. VII.

Of the men of renown before the Floud.

NOw let us conſider the relation of Moſes, who nameth ſeven deſcents of Cains children: and of Adam by Seth, ten; Seth being given by God in ſtead of Abel: And of Seth was Enoſh begotten, in whoſe time men began to profeſs Religion, and to offer ſacrifice in publick. For although Adam inſtructed his Children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the Sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it ſeemeth that after the death of Enoſh, men began publickly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they ſerved and praiſed God by Communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the Sons of God, or the Godly, diſtinguiſhed from the wicked. From the birth of Enoſh the Son of Seth, to the time of Henoch the Son of Jared, there is nothing remembred by Moſes, but their own births, the birth of their Sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written: That he walked with God, and he was no more ſeen: for God took him away. By that, that he walked before God, was meant, that he was a juſt and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the ſame phraſe Moſes uſeth of Noah; Noah was a juſt and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch, placuit Deo; Enoch pleaſed God. And although Aben-Ezra, and others, underſtand this place, (tulit eum Deus) ſcilicet, mortuus eſt; God took him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phraſe of the Scripture, and with our manner of ſpeech to this day to ſay, God took him away when he died; yet the difference which Moſes maketh between the piety of Henoch, and the reſt of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he uſeth to all elſe, makes it manifeſt, that Henoch was not diſſolved as the reſt. For to all the reſt of the Patriarchs, Moſes uſeth theſe words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he ſpake otherwiſe, ſaying only, He was miſſing, or, he was not ſeen. Et non inveniebatur (ſaith the Apoſtle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum tranſtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the ſame place it is expreſly added, that he ſaw not death.

Gen. 5. 24.

V. 7.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the ſame kind of changing which St. Paul promiſeth, when he ſaith, that, when the end the end ſhall come, we ſhall not all die, but all ſhall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

1 Cor. 15. 51.

After Enoch, Moſes paſſeth over to Methuſalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the reſt) the times of their birth and death: ſaving that Lamech propheſied of his Son Noah, ſaying, This ſame ſhall comfort us concerning our work, and ſorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath curſed. Of Noah, Moſes writeth more amply than of any of the reſt of Adams children by Seth, being the laſt of the ten generations of the firſt Age, whom God (with his Family) preſerved, becauſe he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

Gen. 5. 29.

Gen. 6. 9.

But of the War, Peace, Government, and policy of thoſe ſtrong and mighty men, ſo able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whoſe ſtories, if they had been preſerved, and what elſe was then performed in that newneſs of the World, there could nothing of more delight have been left to Poſterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their ſtrength of body and natural wits, had the expeperience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of neceſſity muſt the ſame add of wiſdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatſoever can be told of after-times, eſpecially in reſpect of this old age of the world, when we no ſooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præceps; (which is) Life is ſhort, art is long, time is headlong. And that thoſe people of the firſt Age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of theſe words of Moſes; Theſe were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But theſe men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for ſtrength of body, and cruelty of mind) truſted ſo much to their own abilities, as they forgat altogether the piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, onely evil and continually evil. And this wickedneſs was not onely found in the iſſues of Cain, but it was then univerſal, when the children and Sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and miſ-led by their Idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of thoſe other men, loving themſelves and the World onely.

Gen. 6. 4.

Gen. 6. 5.

That theſe Sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of Women, and begat Giants, ſome of the Fathers ſuppoſed; namely, Lactantius, and Euſebius, miſ-led by Joſephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this miſtaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themſelves with large anſwers, and very needleſs: the queſtion being uncapable of diſpute, eſpecially ſince S. Chryſoſtom and S. Auguſtine have anſwered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in Scripture: and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who (as Chriſt witneſſeth) behold the face of God, (that is) always attend his commandments, ſhould after a ſeparation from the reſt which fell with Lucifer, forſake the glorious preſence of their Creatour, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madneſs to imagine.

SECT.

SECT. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moſes ſo called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as alſo, divers in later times.

OF theſe Giants which Moſes calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antueripian (who thought his own wit more Gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod, or Hercules) hath written a large Diſcourſe, intituled, Gigantomachia; and ſtrained his brains to prove, that there were never any ſuch men: his reaſons (whoſoever deſires to loſe time) he may find them in the Treatiſes before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monſtrous fictions: who affirm ſhameleſsly, That the Giants have in elder times, not only caſt up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Iſlands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of caſting up Hills, and making War with the gods, no doubt but that the ſame was borrowed out of the Story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this Scripture. That the Sons of God ſaw the Daughters of Men, of whom the firſt Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken from Orpheus and Heſiodus, That Giants were the Sons of the Heaven and the Earth, meaning by the Heavens the Sons of God, and by the Earth, the Daughters of Men: which verſes of Orpheus are by John Caſſam (who hath written a very witty Diſcourſe of this Subject) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine cœleſtes illos dixère Gigantes,
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & ſanguine cœli.

From th' Earth, and from thy bloud, O heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators, and ſelf-believing men diſpute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the firſt Age ſuch kind of men; and of which there have been in all times ſince; ſeeing the Scriptures avow the one manifeſtly, and common experience the other?

And for that ſuperlative ſtraining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppreſſors and Tyrants, and not to ſtrength of body, and eminent ſtature: ſuch men might with better reaſon call them Oppreſſors, becauſe they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppreſs, than ſay, That they were called Giants onely, becauſe Oppreſſors. For firſt, Moſes himſelf calleth them mighty men; which ſheweth a ſtrength ſurpaſſing others: and afterwards men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous actions. And if the ſame ſtature of body, and ability, had not been found among divers Nations after the general Flood, then might this place of Moſes have more willingly hearkened to a diſpute, and yielded to interpretation.

But beſides all theſe famous Giants found in prophane Hiſtories (which I will reſerve to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the Story of Britany) the Scriptures do clearly, and without all Allegorical conſtruction, avow, That beſides Nimrod, there were found of theſe Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moſes, of Joſuah, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Aſteroth; the Zuzæi, or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab; whom Moſes (for ſtature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they alſo were taken for Giants as the Anakims. Likewiſe where Moſes ſpeaketh of the Land of Ammon, he uſeth theſe words: That alſo was taken for a Land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: and, whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims; a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And theſe Giants called Rephaims in Aſteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chederlaomer, King of Elam, overthrew, aſſiſted by other Kings his aſſociates. Alſo the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites, men of Giant-like ſtature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whoſe ſtrength to the Oaks: and the Prophet Baruch, Theſe were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature, and ſo expert in warr. Particularly, it is written of Og King of Baſan, that his bed of Iron was nine Cubits long, and four Cubits broad: for onely Og King of Baſan remained of the remnant of the Giants who commanded the Kingdom of Baſan four hundred years after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, thoſe Diſcoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promiſe (ſent by Moſes from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their return of the great ſtature of thoſe people in general, and eſpecially of the Sons of Anak, in theſe words: All people which we ſaw in it, are men of great ſtature: for there we ſaw Giants, the Sons of Anak, which come of the Giants, ſo that they ſeemed in our ſight, like Graſhoppers, and ſo we were in their ſight, (that is) the Searchers found in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themſelves: inſomuch that the Iſraëlites were ſo ſtricken with fear, as they rather ſought, and deſired, to return again into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former ſlavery, than to fall by the ſtrokes of thoſe fearfull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliah the Philiſtine of Gath, was a Giant of ſix Cubits and a ſpan long: the Armour which he wore, weighed five thouſand ſhekels of Braſs: the ſhaft of his ſpear was like a Weavers beam, and his ſpear head weighed ſix hundred ſhekels of Iron. Alſo in Samuel there is mention of another Goliah, ſurnamed Getheus, becauſe he was of Gath, and of there other Giants; of which the firſt was ſlain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great ſtature, and his fingers were by ſixes, even four and twenty.

Alſo that Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after ſlew thirty of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Aſs: And laſtly, he took the Gates of Azzah, and the two poſts, and lifted them away with the barrs, and put them upon his ſhoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both Nature, and the Heavens wax old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it ſelf) infeebled and almoſt worn out the virtue of all things, then I ſay, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increaſed the curſe and corruption) brought forth her young ones more ſtrong and beautifull, than it did in after ages: ſo alſo thoſe Giants, thoſe mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and ſtrength of thoſe Giants, remembred by Moſes of his own time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinary proportion of men in general, ſoon after the Floud, and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born, in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth Age, much more in the firſt flouriſhing youth and newneſs of the World.

But the wickedneſs (eſpecially in cruelty and oppreſſion) of theſe men was ſuch, as God therefore by Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiarius insinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes; God* (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to do) but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World; and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

SECT. I.

That in old Corruptions, we may find some signs of more antient Truth.

HEre, before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider how the Greeks, and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical sence, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixed Discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stoln out of the Books of God. But as a skilful and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpful Medicines out of poison, as poison out of the most healthful Herbs and Plants (all things having in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those that seek after God and Truth, find out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively expresst.

SECT. II.

That the Corruptions themselves were very ancient, as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BUT this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Man-kind, it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal Grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced Plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general Flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of man-kind. Yea, even among the few Sons of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the Children of Shem did inherit the Virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the Son of Cham did possess the vices of the Sons of Cain and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldæans began, soon after the Floud, to ascribe Divine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians did not onely learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several Gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutuatos, eosque prius Aras, & Imagines, & Templa Diis, sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples, for the gods.

Herod. in Euterpe.

SECT. III.

That in process of time, these lesser errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BUT as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: so did these gross and Blind Idolaters, every Age after other, descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortal men onely, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayr, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Mind, to Paleness, Sickness, Sorrows, yea, to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Bovem colis, ego Deis macto bovem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidi suavissimum.
Carnes suillas tu caves, at gaudeo
His maximè: canem colis, quim verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo forte obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beef which you adore.
I broyl th'Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:
You fear to eat the flesh of Swine; I find it sweet.
You worship Dogs; to beat them I think meet,
When they my store devour.

And in this manner Juvenal.

Porrum, aut cæpe, nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians think it sin to root up, or to bite
Their Leeks or Onyons, which they serve with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their own sowing
Have store of gods in every Garden growing!

SECT. IV.

That from the Relicks of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubal-Cain, &c.

But in so great a confusion of Vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these Inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient Pattern they erected their Building; were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some Inscriptions upon Stone or Metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the Son of Cham, who had learned the same of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: For, all that the Egyptians write of their antient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained: and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which St. Augustine out of Varro, Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, & many more have observed, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations, yet was Cain, the Son of Adam, (as some very Learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturn: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities, and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochii, before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Hyginus in his 275 Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men: Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove ædificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East-side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochii were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an Incloser or Strengthener of Cities) say Phornutus and Pausanias;) and that to Jupiter Herceios, there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And, that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that, soon after Mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plain terms in his third Book of Laws: for he saith, That Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And besides this City of Henoch, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Jesca, Selet, and Gebat: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now, as Cain was the first Jupiter, & from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Jubal, Tubal, and Tubal-Cain (Inventors of Pastorage, Smith-craft, and Musick) the same which were called by the Ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo. And as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema, or Naamath, the Sister of TubalCain, to signifie Venusta, or beautiful, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the Wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus the Lady of pleasure & beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturn; Cain, the eldest Jupiter; Eva, Rhea, and Noema, or Naamath, the first Venus: So did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren, the Sons of Saturn, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren, the Sons of Noah; So also was the fiction of those golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Evah: So was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Propheses, that Christ should break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: So out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the Inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars and heavenly Signes, and (withal) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astræa: of which Ovid;

For although thereby the Ethnicks would understand Justice it self to have failed, as it is a virtue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe Virtues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Lust by Venus; so do they also the persons of men by like Virtues and Vices: and therefore by Justice and Astræa, Enoch; the Justice and Piety of Enoch, being in the same manner expres'd, as that of Noah was by Moses: for Noah was said to be a just man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

the wicked (whom Moſes calleth mighty men, and men of renown) did they ſteal thoſe wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and again, their Warr undertaken againſt the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Auguſtine termeth him. Which War of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus deſcribeth: Lib. de Civit. Dei.

Tentavere (neſas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captivique Jovis transferre Gigantes
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cœlo.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand
Againſt the Stars, to thruſt them headlong down;
And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown,
On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purpoſed to raiſe the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, ſhould bury them under the moiſture of a ſecond Floud, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it ſelf. Alſo the making of Leagues, Peace and Covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneids hath a touch, was (as it ſeemeth) borrowed from Moſes, Exod. 24. who, when he read the Book of the Covenant, ſprinkled the people with bloud. Joſeph. l. 1. contra Appian.

We find alſo many remembrances of Seth, the paternal Anceſtor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the ſame King of Egypt which reigned at ſuch time as Moſes carried thence the Children of Iſrael (as of late ſome learned men, miſtaking his time, ſuppoſed) called his Son and Succeſſour Setho, of Seth: and of Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Scuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth moſt manifeſtly preſerved, that the Egyptians worſhipped Seth, as their moſt antient Parent, and of the firſt Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Sethoitica. We alſo find in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the ſame name elſewhere. And ſure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they ſcorned to acknowledg any antiquity preceding their own: and that they might not ſeem to learn elſewhere, they gave the ſame names to their own Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs. Plut. in Iſid. Strab. l. 17.

SECT. V.

Of the three chiefeſt Jupiters, and the ſtrange Story of the third.

BUT of all thoſe Armies of Jupiters, remembred by the Antients, Cicero maketh but three, becauſe thoſe were of moſt fame: which other Writers have alſo done, who ſought out, and laboured in their originals.

The firſt was Jupiter, the Son of Aether and Dies, ſo called, becauſe the one had reference to his Celeſtial conditions (for æther is as much as ſhining or pure fire:) the other diſcovered his natural virtues, which days and times make more perfect, and are the witneſſes of mens actions.

The ſecond was ſaid to be the Son of Cœlum or Heaven, for the ſame former reſpect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third, of whom all the Grecian Fables were deviſed, was of Crete (now Candie,) the Son of Saturn and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken out of Juvans pater, from the Greek word Zeus; it ſignifieth life, but ſomewhat ſtrained. Boccas in his Genealogy of the Gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had ſuch a name before the ſame was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moiſt, temperate, modeſt, honeſt, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving and faithful, (that is) giving theſe inclinations. And therefore thoſe antient Kings beautified with theſe conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howſoever they were, or were not with thoſe virtues inriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldeſt times aſſumed thoſe Titles and Sirnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world (howſoever deſerved) as the worthieſt that ever were, acquired by their well-deſervings. Joves omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui, The Antients called all Kings Jupiters, as Tzetzes in his varia hiſtoria confirmeth; Reges olim Joves vocârunt omnes; In old times all Nations call'd their Kings Jupiters. But where this laſt and moſt remembred Jupiter was born, it is uncertain. Some there are, that make him of Crete: others, that he was but ſent thither by his Mother Ops, or Opis, to be ſoſtered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: becauſe it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titan's permiſſion, he ſhould put to death all his male Children, leſt the Titans might be interrupted by any one of them in their ſucceſſion; which agreement, becauſe Saturn performed in his firſt-born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine: Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Haud ſit pinguior,
Crudis ſepulchrum quòd ſit ipſe filiis.

Saturn to be the father is not known,
By being the grave and burial of his own.

This compoſition between Titan and Saturn, Sybilla alſo witneſſeth in theſe words;

Conceptis verbis, Titan jurare coëgit
Saturnum, de ſe natum ne nutriat ullum,
Quò poſſint regnare, ſenis poſt fata, Nepotes.

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturn ſwear
No Son to nouriſh, which by reigning might Uſurp the right of Titan's lawful heir.

But Opis the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (firſt called Lyſanias) into Crete, as ſhe did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnoſſus, the chief City of that Iſland, by Creſta the King, or by the Curetes, a People and Nation thereof. Euſeb. in Temp.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian; others make him of Meſſena. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and firſt foſtering. Some affirm that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting ſuch a God; others, that he was nouriſhed by Bears: others, by Goats: and of all theſe the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end, when Titan had knowledg that Saturn had broken his faith, he set on him, and took him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the less powerful, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdom in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many virtues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after he was once setled, and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as do ascribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the sin of Sodom with Ganimedes and others: and did not only begin with incest, marrying his own Sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame; Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the Wife of Amphytrion, by whom he had Pelasgus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountain Taygetus took name; with another Son called Saon, of whom Savonas; by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Læda, Castor and Pollux, Hellen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus; by Jordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia, he had Athlius the Father of Endymion: and by jö (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus, married Lybia, of whom that Country took name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. He ravished Aegina the Daughter of Aesopus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aeacus: by Torrhebia he had Archesilaus and Carbius: by Ora, Colaxes: he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium or Troy. He begat the Brothers Talici, on Thalia; and on Garamantis, Hearbas. He had besides these (if they bely not their chief god) Phileus and Pilumnus, inventers of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be Father to all these, who were born in Ages so far differing. And of these his several ravishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens Wives, Daughters, and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those antient fables of his transformations into showers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monster Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Book de natura Deorum, affirm, that he deserved nothing less; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (saith Lucian.) Cretenses non solùm natum apud se, & sepultum Jovem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum ejus ostendunt; The Cretians, or Candians, do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they shew his Grave and Sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth; for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Jasius. This, Callimachus in his Hymns also witnesseth; but, as offended thereat, saith thus:

Luc. in Sacrif.

> The Cretians ever lyars were, they care not what they say:
> For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Lybian Fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek Writers, that the original of these gods was from the Western parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantidæ reigned one Uranus (which signifieth Heaven) called so, for his great skill in Astrology; and for his knowledg, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives Fourty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Titea, he had Seventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name, the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that she for her goodness was Canonized as a Goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was styled Heaven. But of all the Children of Titea, her Daughter Basilea (which name sounding as Queen in English, she is by the Latine Translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in virtue as in years, was by general consent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Father's death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardliness of these children moved her Brethren to envy, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Poe. The loss of this child, caused his sister to break her own neck; and the loss of both her children, made the Mother to play many mad prancks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom she is said to have vanished away. E're she died, her Son (as the Fable hath it) signified unto her in a Dream, that he and his sister, by the providence of God, should become immortal; that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their names, and that their death should be revenged upon the Murtherers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withal held her self as a goddess; and tearmed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilest they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sons of Uranus divided the Kingdom. Of these, Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his name; a Just and Wise Prince, deeply skilful in Astrology: and, for invention of the Sphere, said to have supported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was said to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill, in the middest of his contemplations; and his name, in honour of him, imposed by the people upon the morning Star. The seven Daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in quality to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the Seven Stars called Pleiades, took name. Saturn, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italy. Jupiter, another of the Sons of Uranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten Sons, which he called Curetes: he called that Island after his Wives name, Idea; in which Isle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Lybians were true. Saturn (as these Lybians tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, near to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonis. He also begat on Amalthea, a Son, called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nysa, and Island in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva, and certain Nimphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in form like a Horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these news, she fled from her Husband to her brother Saturn, who, not onely entertained her as a sister, but took her to Wife, and at her instigation, made warr upon Hammon, vanquished him by the assistance of the Titans, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings Daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (women, as may seem, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdome. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting of Trees, and many things else commodious for man-kind, before the flight of his Mother-in-law. Now therefore, hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titans; he levied an Army, to which the Amazons, living not farr from Nysa, added great forces, in love of Minerva, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, and overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaved himself so well, that he wan the love of all the people by whom he passed; in so much, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous Government, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Hammon, he wan a battel of Saturn before the very walls. After which, Saturn, with his Wife Rhea, fled by night, setting the Town on fire, to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entertained. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East-Countreys: and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governour of the Countrey; but appointed unto him as an Over-seer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilest Bacchus travelled through all Nations, as farr as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held gods, joyning all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chased them, took and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were Deified; and the great Jupiter, the Son of Saturn, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the World, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between the tale of the Lybian gods, and the Egyptian Fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the Expeditions of Osiris and of Bacchus; the warrs of the Giants in the one Story, of the Titans in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Basilea, with many pretty circumstances, neerly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, that it is a true Story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate, and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogie, he adds Elius, or the Sun, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, Betilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus, the proper name of Terrenus, or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete.

to

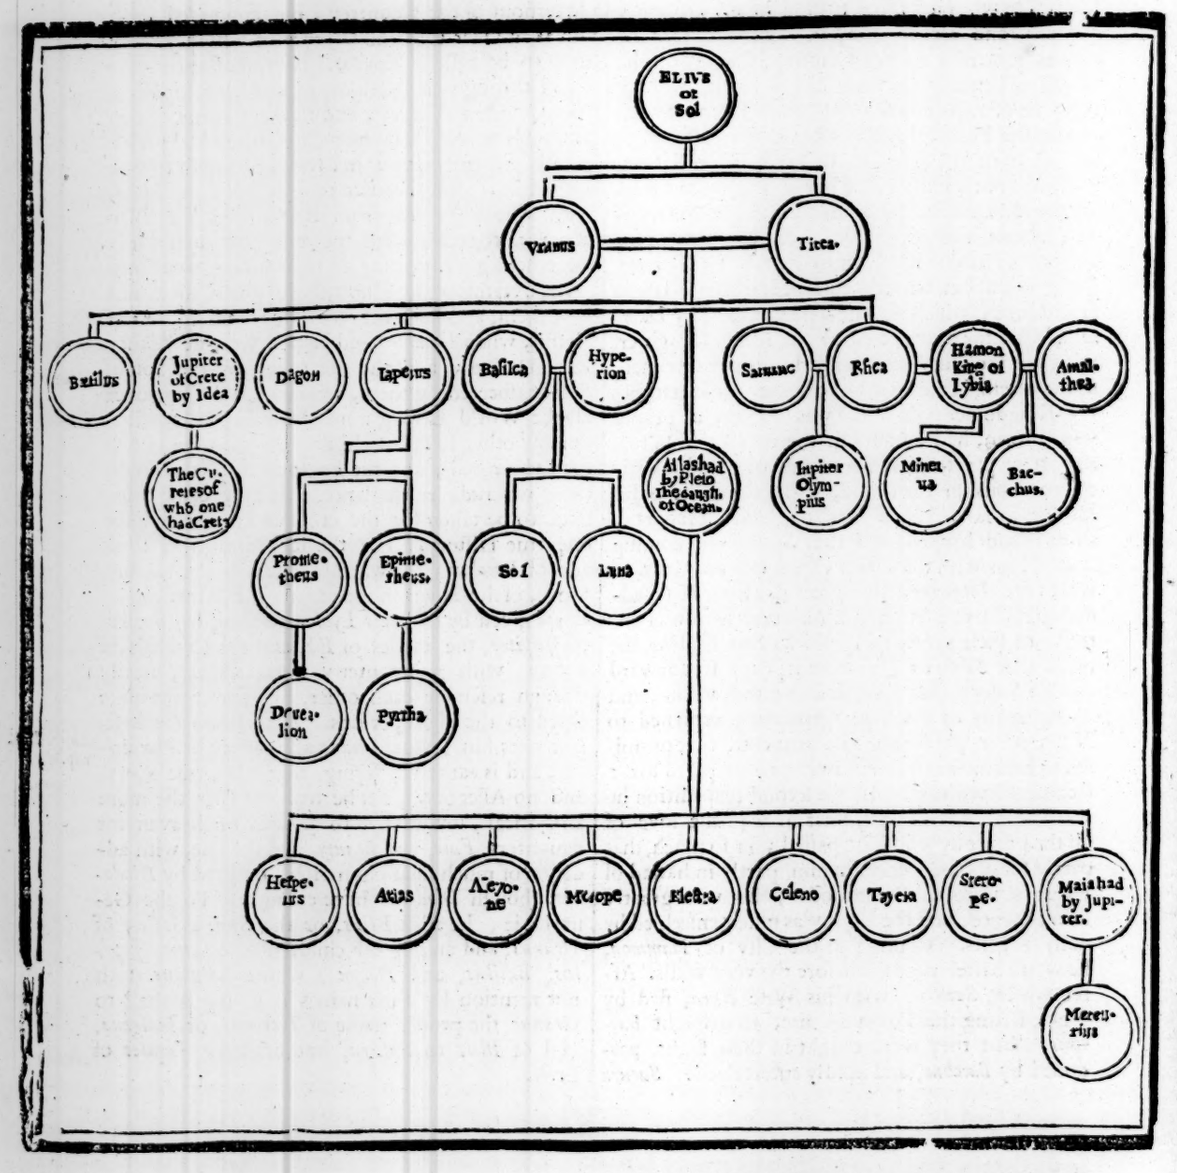
The

The Pedigree of them is this:



SECT. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones; whereof some gat, some affected, the name of God.

OF Jupiter Belus, the Son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name;) who was more ancient than any of the former three, by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the Floud, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to entitle Cham, the Parent of their own Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth Heat: because the Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayr is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the Antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was born not long before the War of Troy, as by many of his Sons is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that Age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was destroyed.

Peucer de Oraculo.

Now seeing that mortal men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed Monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots, as she was.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

That the wiser of the antient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiod in Hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the Books of Moses, as by places stoln thence, almost word for word, may appear; of which Justine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things for fear of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet S. Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirificè iis delectatus est, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Justine Martyr. Now, howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge, from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jews, and Books of Moses; * Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reason to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or savouring of Divinity: and the same opinion had S. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

Areopagus or domus seu mons Martis, Mars his hill: a house wherein capital matters are tried: so called at first, because Mars therein first pleaded his cause for the murther of Hulirrhothos, Pausan in Attic. Nat. Com. l. 2. 6, 7. Just. Mart. ad in. Gen. fol. 8. 14. ut sup. Exod. 3. 14.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authours names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson; I cannot judge. Justine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whose words among many other of the same effect, are these; Plato, Mosis mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato, fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians, to make mention of Moses, that he taught there is but one God. But for that Divinity which he hath written in Timæo, Id ipsum de Deo disseruit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Justine Martyr) which Moses did. For, where it pleased God by his Angel to answer Moses, Ego sum existens, (which is) I Am; and, Existens misit me ad vos; I Am hath sent me unto you; herein did Plato (saith Justine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim qui existit (inquit;) Plato, quod existit; for Moses saith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now, of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or express the same, he giveth this testimony: Genitorem Universitatis tam difficile est invenire, quam inventum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Universal, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil, he is no cause at all. And again, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the Worlds creating, and the original of all things. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infirnitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: & nihil est Deo similius & gratius, quam vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like, or more acceptable to God, than a Man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmeth, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cœpit; because he never had any beginning. Zeno, that God beheld even the thoughts of men; Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholar of Anaxagoras.

In Timæo.

De legib. l. 10.

Laertius.

Cœlum terraque unius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjunctæ amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita:
Arbores, aves, feræ, quasque affert mare,
Genusque mortalium.

Heaven and Earth one form did bear:
But when dis-joyned once they were
From mutual embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato; so we find the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envie and danger of the time: but that he could attribute those things to the Sons of men, and mortal creature, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man, who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith Mirandula) quos Orpheus canit, non decipientium Dæmonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina; The names of those gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving Devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodness, but they are the names of natural and divine Virtues. Yea, that he reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymn following, teach us: Respiciens verò ad divinum hunc sermonem, ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend
Thy heart, that's reason, sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the Worlds sole King: First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone
All else; in which he's still: nor could it e're befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And

And again the same Author,

Jupiter omnipotens, et primus, et ultimus idem;
Jupiter est caput & medium: Jovis omnia munus.
Jupiter est fundamen humi, & stellantis Olympi.
Jupiter & mas est, & fœmina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Jupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radix, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse.
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occuluit; magno post numine sacrum
Cor referans, bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.

The first of all is God, and the same last is he;
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be,
God is the base of Earth, and of the starred Skie,
He is the Male and Female too, shall never die.
The Spirit of all is God, the Sun and Moon, and what is higher.
The King th' original of all, of all the end.
For close in holy breast he did all comprehend, Whence all the blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now (besides these former testimonies) that all the Learned men of antient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Readers to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Plessis, Daneus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and Properties; Bonus, justus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, alwaies doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, That God who beheld all things, and pierced every Nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus; Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the only King of kings: And with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best Artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes; Save only in that everlasting Country, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore nec mente mortalibus similibus; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally nor mentally like unto mortals. And Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty; as is manifest to all: but of what Form he is, it is manifest to none, save onely to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum naturæ causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ullo comprehensus, eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the Soul, the eternal preserver of living Creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hierom, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei: ut, apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the Books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as, in Plato, God the Creator of the World: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgment; never any man whose mind the Art of Education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unresistable necessity, one true God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly express'd, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by devilish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Devil perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in aw and order their common people.

Hieron. in Com. in Dan. in princip.

SECT. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every man's chimny, which the lack of Fuel starveth, Water quencheth, and want of Ayr suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's Jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and dureful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth, nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Dianа. There are none now in Phœnicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollo's Priests are become speechless; and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his over-throws and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eulæan Pyrates: Secondly, condly, by the Phlegians utterly ſack'd: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captains of the Phocenſes: Sixthly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again ſet up at the common charge. But whatſoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Conſtantine, the Chriſtian Army made ſpoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithſtanding all this, it was again glorioufly re-built, and ſo remained till ſuch time as Julian the Apoſtata ſent thither to know the ſucceſs of his Parthian enterpriſe, at which time it was utterly burnt and conſumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himſelf, and all the reſt of the Idols therein, molten down, and loſt in the Earth.

The like ſucceſs had the Jews in the ſame Julian's time, when by his permiſſion they aſſembled themſelves to rebuild the Temple of Jeruſalem: for while they were buſied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an Earthquake, and many Thouſands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the Ruines, and others ſlain and ſcattered by Tempeſt and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, aſcribing this to the nature of that Element. For, ſaith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the Province of Judea, being by Julian buſied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire iſſuing near the foundation, and oft conſuming the Workmen, made the Enterprize fruſtrate.

SECT. IX.

Of the laſt refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

NOw the Devil, becauſe he cannot play upon the open ſtage of this World, (as in thoſe daies) and being ſtill as induſtrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himſelf than ever. For whereas he firſt taught them to ſacrifice to Monſters, to dead Stones cut into faces of Beaſts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now ſets before them the high and ſhining Idol of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tells them that Truth is the Goddeſs of dangers and oppreſſions, that chaſtity is the enemy of Nature, and laſtly, that as all virtue (in general) is without taſte; ſo pleaſure ſatisfieth and delighteth every ſenſe: for true wiſdom (ſaith he) is exerciſed in nothing elſe, than in the obtaining of power to oppreſs, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Polititian find in his Pupils any remorſe, any feeling or fear of God's future judgments, he perſwades them that God hath ſo great need of men's Souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timeful return towards God, by laying thoſe great blocks of rugged poverty and deſpiſed contempt in the narrow paſſage leading to his divine preſence. But as the mind of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other deſolate and over-grown with graſs, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: ſo hath that of Death a double and twofold opening, worldly miſery paſſing by the one, worldly proſperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our ſufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our cruelties, covetouſneſs, licentiouſneſs, injuſtice and oppreſſions (the harbingers of moſt fearful and terrible ſorrow) ſtaying for us. And as the Devil our moſt induſtrious Enemy was ever moſt diligent; ſo is he now more laborious than ever: the long day of Mankind drawing faſt towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and Time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Floud.

SECT. I.

Of God's fore-warning: and ſome humane Teſtimonies: and ſome doubting touchng the truth of Noah's Floud.

OF this deſtruction it pleaſed God to give warning unto Noah: who (ſaith Joſephus) fearing to periſh among the reſt, Decedens cum ſuis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children, and travelled into another Region. And of theſe Giants from whom Noah withdrew himſelf, Beroſus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all ſorts of inhumane and unnatural wickedneſs, and that they were contemptores & religionis & deorum; contemners of Religion and of the gods: Among which mighty men (ſaith Beroſus) unus erat qui deorum verentior, & prudentior tunctis, &c. huic nomen erat Noah; There was one more wiſe and reverencing the Gods than the reſt, whoſe name was Noah: who with his three Sons, Sem, Japhetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the wife of Noah, (namely Titea the Great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preſerved themſelves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God ſaid unto Noah, Make thee an Ark of Pine-Trees: thou ſhalt make cabins in the Ark, and ſhalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all fleſh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already faſhioned in the Clouds, which ſoon after ſhould ſwallow up and cover all living Creatures which breathed in the Air, Noah and his Family excepted.

But this universal grave of Waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for divine testimones do not perswade all natural men to those things to which their own reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilest the truth lieth wrapt in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this Overflowing, and have judged that this Flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdoms: moved so to think, because in elder Ages there have been many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicolas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Josephus. Est super Minyadam excelsus Mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca devectum in hujus vertice hæsisse, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit de quo etiam Moses Judæorum legislator scribit: thus far this Author. There is (saith he) above Minyada (or the Country of Minyæ) an exceeding high Mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the Deluge; and that one was carried in an Ark, and rested upon the top of the Mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same of which Moses the Law-giver of the Jews makes mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (saith Annius) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.

Lact. impræs. de falsa relig.

Jos. Ant. l.1. c.4. Euseb. de præp. l. 9. c. 4.

But Berosus (who, after Moses, was one of the most ancient, howsoever he hath been since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the general Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua universus periit Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World universal perished; witnessing withal, that Noah with his Wife Titea, and his three Sons with their Wives (in all eight persons) were only saved.

SECT. II.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

But from the vanity of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius,) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the errour first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the World that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodiginus) Ogygium id appellant Poetæ, tanquam pervetus dixeris ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

Rho. l.15. c. 33.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that he lived but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. years after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he far later) as Rhodiginus in the ninth Book of his Antiquites remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnasse autumant hunc; unde sit Cadmus, qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à Bove jugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who think that this Ogyges did reign in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece, built Thebes, so named of a Beef slain: because in the Syrian Language, a Beef is called Thebe.

Euseb. de Præp. Evang. l.10. c. 3. Ca. 22.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the World, 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. between these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now, although the very year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set down, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds above 500. years difference between that and the general Flood.

For, Paulus Orosius, affirms that this tempest fell upon the Athenians, but 1040. years before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome, which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the Worlds year, 3219 though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds year, 3280. Now, the general Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563 years: and the Flood of Ogyges, (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Floods must be 520 years, to which we (allowing 60 more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some do) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica, or Ogygia, did not extend it self any farther then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Ægæan Sea. For, whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witness, that the City of Joppe in Judæa was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the height of Waters) there remained on certain Altars of Stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Flood of Ogyges spred it self over any part of Syria, much less over all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which Ovid.

Of this Floud of Ogyges, was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the Daughter of Cœus, the Son of Titan, being beloved, and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withal, caused the monstrous Serpent Python, to follow and affright her, whersoever she travelled; till at length arriving at the Isle of Ortygia, she was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this Exposition; That at such time as the Deluge

Nat. Com. l.1. c.6.

Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reign) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogs, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Ægean Sea, neither the beams of the Sun by day, nor of the Moon by night, could pierce the ayr, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayr began to be clear, the people of Ortygia espied the light of the Moon somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moon, and Apollo the Sun) they were reported to be born in the Isle of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth Manifestation.

Plin. l. 4. c. 11.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayr, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusual face of the Skies. Varro in his Books, de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augustine) reports out of Castor, that so great a miracle hapned in the Star of Venus, as never was seen before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatness, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 21. c. 8.

Now, concerning the course of that, or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks or elsewhere in those days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should need no reformation: Of the colour and magnitudes I see no reason, why the difference found in the Star of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and foggs than those which covered Greece with so long darkness, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sun and Moon. That the figure should vary, questionless it was very strange: yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightned by him, the opposite half should remain shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, descrying only that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the Moon doth seem; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the help of perspective Glasses, hath found in the Stars many things unknown to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have been discovered in Venus, by his late Observations. Whether some watry disposition of the ayr might represent as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galilæus hath seen through his instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of errour. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of S. Augustine) accompanied with such unusual (and therefore the more dreadfull, though natural) signs, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah, which was general, and altogether miraculous, may seem to have had no other token, or fore-shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himself, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud came suddenly, and took them all away.

Luke 17. v. 27.

SECT. III.

Of Deucalions Floud: and that this was not Noahs Floud: nor the Umbri in Italy, a remnant of any universal Floud.

A Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (ut Varro scribit) regnante Athenis Cranao, successore Cecropis (ut autem nostri, Eusebius & Hieronymus*) adhuc eodem* Cecrope permanente, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est Deucalionis: (that is) In these times, (as Varro reporteth) Cranous the successor of Cecrops governed the Athenians, or, (as our Eusebius and Hierome say) Cecrops yet living, that Floud (called Deucalions*) happened.*

And in the beginning of the 11. Chapter of the said 18. Book, he useth these words: Eduxit ergo Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Ascatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Triopas: Moses led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter time of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, Ascatades reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Triopas. So as leaving the curiosity of a few years, more or less, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. years, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the World, 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. years after Noah, and in the year of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were born in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman: then giving unto Deucalion 40. years of age when this Floud happened, it falleth within one year of Mercators account. But Deucalion, by all approved Historians, is said to have been 82. years old at that time. Now, Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaeton's time, by the Reign of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives six years after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty years difference, according to Functius, who will have this Floud and Burning to have fallen 14. years before Moses left Egypt: for he gave the Worlds years to the Floud and Burning, the year 2440. and to Moses egression the year 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the Burning of Phaëton preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessaly (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. years, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie, makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. year of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770. years: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem Græcia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio quæ fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece, in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Floud of Ogyges. Now, if the Floud of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. years before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius (as before;) then it is manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Floud pened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 260. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Euſebius and Oroſius. And for my ſelf (who rather follow thoſe Chronologers, which give 60. years more to Abraham after the Floud, than the reſt) I reckon the times which come between theſe Flouds in this ſort. The general Floud was in the year of the World 1656. Jacob was born in the year of the World 2169. ſo as from the beginning of the Floud to Jacobs birth, there were conſumed 513. years. Ogyges Floud happened 100. years after Jacob was born; and therefore after the general Floud 613. years. Now, Deucalion was born in the year of the World 2356. and had lived 82. years, when his kingdom of Theſſaly was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his floud was after Noah's Floud ended, 782. years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. years between the general Floud and Deucalion's birth; to which add 82. years of his Age (as before) and then the floud of Theſſaly followed the general 782. years. The words of that Xenophon are theſe: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, ſecundo anno Sphæri, ſeptingenti ſupputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theſſaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the ſecond year of Sphærus, are numbred 700. years, and when Deucalion was 82. years old, he ſaw Theſſaly drowned. This Floud hapned in the Winter time about Parnaſſus: witneſs Ariſtotle, in the firſt of his Meteors. And Varro (whom S. Auguſtine ſo often citeth for his excellent Learning, eſpecially in Antiquities) findeth this floud of Deucalion to have hapned in the time of Cranaus, who ſucceeded Cecrops: Oroſius thinks it ſomewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely over Theſſaly it ſelf, and the Regions adjoyning Weſtward, but it covered the greateſt part of Italy: and either the ſame, or ſome other particular floud then happening, oppreſt Egypt, ſaith Euſebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feign it to be univerſal; and Deucalion the King, ſaving himſelf, and ſome others on the Mountain of Theſſaly (of all other the higheſt, ſaith Solinus) was by reaſon thereof (as Strabo witneſſeth) ſaid to be the preſerver of man-kind. That this floud covered a great part of Italy, Pliny, and Solinus make it probable, who affirm, that the people then inhabiting Italy, were therefore called Ὄμβριοι: quia ab imbribus deluvii ſuperfuiſſent; and therefore alſo were they eſteemed the moſt ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his firſt Book, and Trezenius in his ſecond: which Umbri theſe Authours make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brucii, and all other inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that theſe Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italy before the Floud of Noah, and ſo took name by ſaving themſelves upon the Appenine Mountains, the Scriptures teach us; ſhewing who, and who only then were preſerved, which is ſufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the firſt people which after the general Floud inhabited Italy, were the Cameſenes; (ſo named from Cameſe, whom Cato in Originibus, another of Annius his Authours, names for a conſort of Janus) which people lived altogether a ſavage life; till ſuch time as Saturn arriving on thoſe Coaſts, deviſed Laws to govern them by: the memory of whoſe Acts in that Region, Diodore and Thallus among the Greeks; Nepos, Caſſius, and Varro among the Latines, have preſerved; and of whom Virgil:

And afterwards in the Verſes following he ſpeaketh of the Auſones; and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which again ſought to diſplant the ancient Inhabiters:

Virg. l. 8. Æn.

Tum manus Auſonia, & gentes venêre Sicani.

Then came th' Auſoniam Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of theſe Sicani (which left Spain, and ſate down in Italy) Thucydides and Pliny give teſtimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, ſaith Thucydides. After all theſe Plantations and re-plantations, came the Umbri, deſcended of the Gauls (ſaith Annius) not of thoſe Gauls of France, but of thoſe of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionyſius have aſſured us: and therefore this Floud of Deucalion, was long after that of Noah. For all thoſe Nations were planted in Italy, and diſpoſſeſs'd of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdom was firſt called Cameſene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Auſonia, then Sicania; before the Umbri (in whoſe time Deucalion's Floud happened) poſſeſs'd the ſame, about 306. years before the War of Troy; Lycaon then governing Arcadia: who being the Father of two and twenty Sons, the youngeſt called Oenotrius invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the ſame Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. years before the fall of Troy. After theſe, came the Pelaſgi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his ſixth, ſpeak at large: and after them the Lydi, under Tyrrhenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni, who caſting thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred Caſtles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had poſſeſs'd and paſt over the Appenine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telſina (afterward Bononia) was one.

SECT. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the Universal Floud: and of two antient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

SAint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latines made not any mention of the Universal Floud, because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (wormeaten, or) of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Family, which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine Letters was not received, find no Parent of more antiquity, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledge of Noah's Floud, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hearsay, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountain Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus, to preserve himself from a Floud, fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armeniam navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth Birds, that finding no Land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time; but at the third return, the Birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Eusebius's words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noah's Floud.

Euſ. de præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this general Floud. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who re-counted to Solon out of the holy Books of Egypt the story of the Floud universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Frier Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Floud, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the general Floud for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges; sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah. He called the second, Niliaca; Hercules and Prometheus then living, 44. years before that of Attica, in the 34. year of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I do not believe him as touching the time. But this Floud covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemque aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem tum consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Unde & Græci quidam Poetæ, rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt Aquilam Promethei jecur depascentem occidisse: This Floud (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftness of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great judgment and virtue did again compress and straiten this River, so far extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channel: Whence certain Greek Poets (converting this labour and work of Hercules into a fable) devised, that Hercules slew the Eagle which fed on Prometheu's liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his people and Country (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered.

Nat. com. l. 4. c. 6.

A fourth Floud chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this brief sort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima novimestris Inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon:) the first, which was universal, of nine moneths; and this happened under the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two moneths, under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia under Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance, (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helen's rape. Diodorus, in his fifth Book and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Floud in Asia the less, and else where, of no less destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellespont breaking in over the Land.

Xenop. de æquin. Comm. per Annium, fol. 37.

But there have been many Flouds in divers times and Ages, not inferiour to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same year, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous Overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territory, and in Liguria; accompanied with a most fearful storm of Thunder and Lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the land after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the year 1446, there perished 100000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that Floud to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, in the year 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Floud in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog, in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the year 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. He also remembereth a perilous over-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier, a French Historian, speaketh of a great Floud in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in Anno Domini 1557. with so dreadful a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Judgment-day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountain, about Nismes, there were removed divers old heaps and mountures of ground, and many other places torn up and rent; by which accident there was found both coyn of Silver and Gold, divers pieces of Plate and Vessels of other Mettal, supposed to be hidden at such time

SECT. V.

That the Floud of Noah was ſupernatural; though ſome ſay it might have been foreſeen by the Stars.

NOw, howſoever all theſe Flouds, and many other, which have covered at ſeveral times, ſeveral Regions, not only in theſe parts of the World, but in America alſo, (as I have learned of ſome ancient Southſayers among them) may be aſcribed to natural cauſes and accidents; yet that univerſal Floud (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the eſpecial commandment of God himſelf; who at that time gave ſtrength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible than any ability of nature could effect, or any ſecond cauſes by whatſoever union, could perform, without receiving from the Fountain of all power, ſtrength and faculties ſupernatural. Henricus Mechlinienſis, a Scholar of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albu Maſar, obſerveth, that before the Floud of Noah, the like Conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn happened in the laſt degree of Cancer, againſt that conſtellation, ſince called the Ship of Argos; by which the Floud of Noah might be foretold, becauſe Cancer is both a watry Sign, and the Houſe of the Moon, which is the Lady of the Sea, and of moiſture, according to the rules of Aſtronomy, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Geneſis confirmeth, affirming, That although Noah did well know this Floud by divine revelation, (yet this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the ſecond cauſes thereof: for thoſe were not only ſigns, but alſo working cauſes, by ſtrength receiv'd from the firſt cauſe, which is God himſelf: And further, that by * Catarractæ cæli, Engliſhed the Windows of Heaven Moſes meant this great and watry Conjunction; the word Catarractæ, ſignifying flowing down, or coming down. Now (ſaith P. de Aliaco) it pleaſed God to ordain by the courſe of the Heavens ſuch a Conſtellation, by which all men might behold therein their deſtruction towards, and thereby forſake thoſe wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Alſo de Concordia Tholog. & Aſtrolog. Gen. 7. 11.

*The word καταῤῥακτος properly ſignifieth any place of ſtoppage, againſt which the force of the water being naturally carried downwards, daſheth and breaketh; of ἀῤῥάσσω, auido, or frango. Hence, becauſe Windows do not only open, but alſo ſhut, the word hath been expounded (Windows) for Bars or Floud-gates.

Of this judgment was Gul. Pariſienſis, who underſtood, that the words Catarractæ Cæli, or Windows of Heaven, were to be taken for the former Conjunction, or for thoſe watry ſigns, Cancer, Piſces, Pleiades, Hyades and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible cauſes of the greateſt Inundations. His own words are theſe; Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Catarractas Cæli vocâſſe, niſi partes illas cæli, quæ generativæ ſunt fluviarum & inundationum Aquarum, quales ſunt ſigna aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforeſaid. As yet (ſaith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by thoſe words (Catarractæ Cæli, or Windows of Heaven) unleſs he thereby underſtandeth thoſe celeſtial powers, by whoſe influences are ingendred the rain and inundations of waters, ſuch as are the watry ſigns of Cancer, &c.

But, in a word, as it might pleaſe God, that in the courſe of his unſearchable wiſdom this Conjunction ſhould at ſuch time be: ſo did he (as aforeſaid) add vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increaſe of virtues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountains, commanding them to caſt out the whole treaſure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and condenſing ayr into water by the miniſtery of his Angels, or whoſoever elſe beſt pleaſed his All-powerfulneſs.

SECT. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the univerſal Floud: And what are Catarractæ Cæli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

NOw, if it be objected, That God doth not create any thing of new; (for God reſted the ſeventh day, that is, he did not then after create any new ſpecies) which granted, it may ſeem that then all the Earth and Ayr had not waters ſufficient to cover the habitable World fifteen Cubits above the higheſt Mountains. Of this Propoſition, whether God had ſo reſtrained himſelf, or no, I will not diſpute; but for the conſequent, (which is) that the World had want of Water to overcover the higheſt Mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and fooliſh; for it is written, That the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, (that is) the waters forſook the very bowels of the Earth, and all whatſoever was diſperſed therein, pierced, and brake through the face thereof. Then let us conſider, that the Earth had above one and twenty thouſand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, ſeven thouſand miles, and then from the Superficies to the Center, ſome three thouſand five hundred miles. Take then the higheſt mountain of the World, Caucaſus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia, or Scythia, or that (of all other the higheſt) in Tennerif, and I do not find, that he that looketh higheſt, ſtretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impoſſible, anſwering reaſon with reaſon, that all thoſe waters mixed within the Earth three thouſand five hundred miles deep, ſhould not well help to cover the ſpace of thirty miles in height; this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and ſixteen times: for, the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we conſider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extenſion of the Ayr over and above it, we ſhall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleaſed God to condenſe but ſo much of this Ayr, as every where compaſſeth and embraceth the Earth, which condenſation is a converſion of Ayr into Water, a change familiar in thoſe Elements; it will not ſeem ſtrange to men of judgment, yea, but of ordinary underſtanding, that the Earth (God ſo pleaſing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Laſtly; For the opinions of Gulielmus Pariſienſis, and Aliacenſis, to which I may adde Beroſus, and others, That ſuch a conjunction there was, fore-ſhewing that deſtruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarractæ Cæli, or Windows of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other anſwer than that obſervation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the graveſt Aſtrologian it was obſerved, that in the year 1524. there ſhould happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Floud; than which (ſaith he) there was never never a more fair, dry, and seasonable year: The like destruction was prophesied, of the year 1588. But Picus of of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Catarractæ Cœli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the word Windows of Heaven (if that be the sence of the word) to express the violence of the Rains, and pouring down of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of Water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windows, or Floud-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That Waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost air, and the Waters fell in abundance: Behold (says Job) he withholdeth the Waters, and they dry up (or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up) but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26 Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the general Floud, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep; and these joyning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the work of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast Caves; and the rest (by a Wind) rarified again into air, formerly condensed into drops.

SECT. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

Noah, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Ark which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every Creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth Quietness: after others, and according to the Propheeie of his Father Lamech, Cessation; to whom aftertimes gave many Names, answering his Antiquity, Zeal, Virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges, there was also a great Floud of Achaia; Saturn they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiters fire; Fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus (id est) Vinosius, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris Ritualibus, in the Books of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturn, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancienteſt feigned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name known. Of the antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimony: Jani ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæserat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populos docuit Janus ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomœria & Sacra docuit; In the time of Janus (saith he) there was no Monarchy: for the desire of rule had not then folded it self about the hearts of men. Janus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meal: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens, and solitary Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among all the Heathen, which in all agrees so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that took on him soveraign Authority. Secondly, Noah, after the Flood, was the first that planted the Vine, and became an Husband-man; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meal. Thirdly, he was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God a thanksgiving for his merciful goodness toward him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Floud. Quia præterita noverit, & futura prospexerit, saith Arnobius: Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Janus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The seed of the World: because, as out of that confused Heap was drawn all the kinds of Beasts and Plants; so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ovid in the person of Janus:

He was also intituled Cælum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledg in Astronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodiseus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in respect of the Floud. For the Greeks called Liber γῆ, and his Nurses Hyades, of Rain, because Noah entred the Ark when the Sun joyned with the Stars Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Neck of Taurus, & ever after a Monument of Noah's Floud. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Son of Neptune; because he lived in safety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Dionysius, quasi Διονύσων, mentem pungens, Bite-brain, or Wit-stinger; though Diodorus conceive otherwise, and derive that name à Patre & Loco; Of his Father and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Nisa, a Town of Arabia fœlix, saith Suidas, out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because he first yoaked Oxen, and Tilled the ground: according to that of Moses; and Noah became an Husbandman. Now howsoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwise Dionysus) it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stollen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more antiently Boacus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Floud: and of Noah (the first and antient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysius, of the Mountain Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatsoever themselves feign of his enterprises: and these Mountains of Nysa joyn with those of Paropanisus, and those other Eastern Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah rested after the Floud.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bear his Name, with many Rivers and Mountains; which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, because the many Names given him, brought the same confusion to places as to himself. Notwithstanding all which, we find the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolemy, Danus; dividing Ilyria from Panonia. Thus much for the Name.

SECT. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

NOw in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Author that hath written thereof; only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiveth that Noah built his Ark neer the Mountains of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among the people, called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchres wrought over with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himself from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Ark; to which also he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only this we are sure of, that the Ark was built in some part of the Eastern World; and to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Floud. For Noah did not use any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Ark no otherwise move, than the Hulk or body of a Ship doth in a calm Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continual and downright Rains, there were any Winds at all, therefore was the Ark little moved from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, Gen. 8. 1. God made a Wind to pass upon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storm or forcible wind at all, which could drive the Ark any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted up. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Ark had fundum planum, A flat bottom, and not raysed in form of a Ship, with a sharpness forward, to cut the Waves for the better speed.

This kind of Vessel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight days he arrived, was first called Larnassus, and by the changing of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it took name of a Son of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inventor of Augmration. Steph de urb. fol. 227.

Peucerus finds the word (Parnassus) to have no affinitie with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Augmration and Divination; or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles, in the Leaf before cited. De Oracul. fol. 94.

Josephus calls the Ark, Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuary, but Thebet such a Vessel, as swimmeth, and beareth it self upon the Waters. Epiph. in Ancor.

Lastly, this Ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship, in this, that it had a Cover and Roof, with a Crest in the middest thereof, and the sides declining like the Roof of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomness of the many Beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Ark. Gen. 6. 4.

Of what Wood the Ark was built, it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place only used, is diversly understood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seventy, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will have it Cypress Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypress is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; If not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promise of God, and his Grace and mercy for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. V. 18. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the use to build Ships of Cedar, which the worms eat not; and he avoweth, that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the City, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subject to putrifying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet savour, lasting also better than any other wood, and because near the place where the Ark rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the Mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that wood: which hath, beside the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build Ships withall. Pererius conceiveth, that the Ark had divers sorts of Timber, and that the bottom had one sort, the deck and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabins; thereby to sever the clean Beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several sorts of Food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the help of a Compass or the North star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Valley of Sodom Plin. l. 16. 6. 80.

Pererius. and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the Fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

SECT. IX.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

THe Ark, according to God's commandement, had of length Three hundred Cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion, it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine; Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesiæ quæ sit salva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit,&c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a Figure of the City of God travelling in this world as a stranger,(that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, heighth and breadth, answereth the shape of Man's body in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed. De Civit. Dei. l. 15. c. 26.

By what kind of Cubit the Ark was measured, it hath been a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the elbow, to the point of the little finger. The second (the Palm-Cubit) which taketh one handful more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

Saint Augustine, considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Ark held, with their food and water, was sometime of opinion, that the Ark had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost six of the common: For, measuring the Ark by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolemy Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgment as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needful to take any kinds of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own Element: Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca quæ possent in aquis vivere, non solùm mersa sicut Pisces, verùm super-natantia, sicut multæ alites; It was not needful to conserve those Creatures in the Ark, which could live in the Waters; and not only Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowls which sit and swim on them. And again, Terra, non aqua maledicta; quia Adam non hujus, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Water which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So, as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not. Athen. dipnosp. l. 4. Plutarch. in vita Demetrij. Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 5. c. 27.

And if we look with the eyes of judgment hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this work of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seem differing, and of several kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needful to preserve them, seeing they might be generated again by others: as the Mules, the Hyæna's, and the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which were red and pied skins, or feathers, are differing from those that are less painted, and wear plain Russet or Black; they are much mistaken that so think. And for mine own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and, even those Dogs which are become wild in Hispaniola, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattel, and do also oftentimes tear asunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red feathers in the drowned and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Nigro's, which we call the Black-Moors, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting; and the best Melons will change in a year or two to common Cowcumers, by being set in a barren soyl. Therefore, taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Ark after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we add but half a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a half of Giantly stature, (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Ark contain 600 foot in length, and 100 foot in breadth, and 60 foot in depth. Acost. hist. India.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Og, King of Basan, had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54 Cubits of the common, which make 80 foot: and Goliah who had the length of six Cubits and an handful which makes nine foot and a handful (a proportion cre- Deut. 3. 11. 1 Sam. 17. 4.

dible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54 foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliah been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth, and three of height) reached the length of 27 foot upright, and so must their Priests have ascended by steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to God's Commandment, given in these words: Exod. 20. 26. Thou shalt not go up with steps unto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the Ordinary Cubit of one foot and an half, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubtless) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other Creatures of a correspondent size. And yet, (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the dayes of Noah, might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of Creatures to be saved, (that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean, with necessary food) might have place in the Ark, Butæo hath very learnedly declared: the brief summ of whose discourse to that purpose, is this; The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplyed by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirty Cubits, sheweth the whole Concavity to have been 450000. Now, whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cubical Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89 distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100 several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them; and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beeves, one Lion to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number onely three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entred into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odd one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as ninety one Beeves; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as an hundred and twenty Beeves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable, with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threescore and four Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabins; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his Family, and all their necessaries.

SECT. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies, and Scythia.

‖ I.

A Præterition of some Questions less material: with a Note of the use of this Question to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHat time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute: but he received the Commandment from God an hundred years before the Waters fell; and had therefore choice of time, and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, Saint Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversie: or, whether those Creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cows, or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this saith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-Pool might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfie my self and others in, is, In what part of the World the Ark rested after the Floud: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the Terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do onely and truly teach the World's Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Floud; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

‖. II.

A Proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

AND first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Floud, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first first settlement and plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to think out of any Humour, or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the original and first truth, which is the Word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, That the Ark stayed upon one of the Mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the Hills Gordæi, or Gordiæi, in Armenia the greater, (as the words Gordæi, and Kardu, seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are: I find neither Scripture nor Reason which teacheth any such thing (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Gen. 8. 4. Damascenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Friar Annius (citing this place out of Josephus) makes him find another adjoyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Ark (of which Moses the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any such Mountain in being, as this Ocila, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Josephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontory in Arabia Fœlix of that name; and Pliny finds a Mart-Town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains. Berosus calleth those Mountains of Armenia, Gordiæi; and Hiero. 51. 27. Curtius, Cordæi; Ptolemy, Gordæi and Gordiæi: of which the Countrey next adjoyning is, by this Nicolaus Damascenus, called Nyniada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Milyada, or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seems to be compounded of this word Minni and Aram: as if we should say Nat. Hist. l. 5. c. 12. Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Pliny witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Carydes about these Mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The Mountains are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Thospitis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41 & 52 degrees of latitude. One of the Mountains, Gordiæi, (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Josephus. Which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noah's coming down with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any Hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius Joseph. de Antiq. l. 1. cap. 4. corrects the place in Josephus Λούβαεις (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Joseph. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called Ἀκβατήριον, (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphanius lib. 1. contr. Hæres. calls it Λόφας, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian Tongue signifieth Descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seem to be derived; and Acts 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that Mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the rest adjoyning.

§. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

But there are many Arguments to perswade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest it self in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan Mountains.

For the first: It is agreed by all who follow Berosus, Beros. l. 1. that it was in the year 130, or in the year 131. after the Floud, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward call'd Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Ark had first found Land in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the Children of Noah, which came into that Valley, could have spent so many years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interjacent, which might by easie Journeys have been past over in twenty dayes; and to hasten and help which passage, the Navigable River of Tygris offered it self, which is every where transpassible by Boats of great burthen; so as where the Desart on the one side resisted their expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self: Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second Floud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it soundeth ill to the ear of reason, that they would have spent many years in that low and over-flown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the effects witnessed their affections; and the works which they undertook, their unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared Inundation. Now, at Babel it was, that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World, founded after the Floud, about 131. years, or (as others suppose) ten years later: though (for my self) I rather think that they undertook that work in two respects; First, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text:) Gen. 10. 10. Beros. l. 1. Secondly, thereby to usurp Dominion over the rest.

§. IV.

The second Argument; That the Eastern People were most ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

For a second Argument: The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing, and Artillery (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade us, that those Sunrising Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this report, that the East Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordinance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonii Tianæi, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expressed in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell between Hyphasis and Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into Battel: but that they drive away their Enemies with Thunder and Lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there it is said, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden Shield. For the invention of Letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no less antient than Seth or Henoch were: for they are said to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembred) long before the Floud. But from the Eastern World it was that John Guttenburgh a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome; and after that Nicolaus Gerson a Frenchman, bettered both the Letters and Invention. And notwithstanding that this Mystery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinois had Letters long before either the Egyptians or Phœnicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civil knowledg, or any Letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred years since discovered those Kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinois account all other nations but salvages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this argument, the conquest and story of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuosity in that little Kingdome of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, than in all his other travails and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, learning and greatness had not travailed so far to the West as Rome. Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village, But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-rising, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island thereof, we shall find that those Nations have sent out, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil; the farther West, the more Salvage. And of the Isle of Japan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & sapientiæ sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philosophy, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians: They acknowledg one King, and worship one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who have been employed in those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

‖. V.

The third Argument, from the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies,

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what Age she lived, and how soon after the Worlds new birth she gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more than three millions to invade India, to which he adjoyned also 500000. Horse; and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Country after the Floud. Now as touching the time wherein she lived: All Historians consent that she was the Wife of Ninus, and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Chush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Army was composed. Let us then see with whom she encountred in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling her own, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus: of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus; Staurobates coactis majoribus, quàm quæ erant Semiramidis, copiis: Staurobates gathering together greater Troops than those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinaar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Staurobates must have been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semirrmis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army Victorious over Semeramis, if the Colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel, overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65. years time after the Floud, before Nimrod was born: of which, thirty years to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then thirty years to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder Brothers, which make sixty five, and then twice thirty years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba, and Dedan with others, to beget their Sons; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five years; there will then remain six years to have been spent in travelling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar, in the year after the Floud 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which Gen. 10. 7.

which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101. and the Confusion to have been at Pelegs birth, these men do all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build Nimrods Tower in the Ayr; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that year 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regal authority in the 131. year after the Floud (according to Berosus) and that the Work of Babel lasted fourty years (according to Glycas) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40. years to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. years after the Floud, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted, (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empress of all that part of the World gathered the most of Nations into one body.

‖. VI.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of Noah.

FOurthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the World before the Flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600. years, was all that space 130. years after the Floud without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western World; (which Travails Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself, then covered with many years, planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman, whose business was to dress and manure the Earth; and not to range over so many parts of the World, as from Armenia into Arabia fœlix, where he should (if the Tradition be sound) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton: then into Spain where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but finding no amendment, they say he banish'd him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travail far in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Floud; the same lay wast and over-grown for 130. or 140. years, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for Woods, Bushes, and Bryars, that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the Valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah who was Father of all those Nations, a man reverenced both for his Authority, Knowledg, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent perswasions he woud have bound their hands from so vain labours, and by the authority which he received even from God himself, he would have held them in that awfull subjection, as, whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of man-kind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up buildings again his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay upon them the same, if not a more sharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest part of the World to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus, and Cœlestinus, take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increase (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Joctan, of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Joctan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sons of Sem: Joctan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East-India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia, and the other adjoyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Joctan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now, another reason which moves me to believe that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the Story of the Hebrews, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all man-kind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a Person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawn himself, and rested a-part with his best Beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the Earth; after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, he is not remembred in the Scriptures, because he was so farr away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

SECT. VII.

Of the ſenſleſs opinion of Annius the Commentor upon Beroſus: who finds divers places where the Ark reſted; as the Caſpian and Gordiæan Hills, which are three hundred miles aſunder; and alſo ſome places of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Friar Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Beroſus and others, laboureth marvellouſly to prove that the Ark of Noah reſted upon the Armenian Mountains called Caſpii; which Mountains ſeparate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And becauſe all his Authors ſpeak of the Mountains of Gordiæi, he hath no other ſhift to unite theſe opinions, but by uniting thoſe far-diſtant Mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge thoſe men with errour, which have carefully over-ſeen, Printed, and Publiſhed Ptolomies Geography, in which they are altogether diſſevered. For that laſt Edition of Mercators ſets theſe Hills five degrees (which makes three hundred Engliſh miles) aſunder. And certainly, if we look into thoſe more ancient Copies of Villanovanus, and others, we ſhall find nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in thoſe the Mountains Caſpii ſtand ſeven degrees to the Eaſt of the Gordiæi, which makes 420. miles. And for thoſe Authors by whoſe authority Annius ſtrengthneth himſelf, Diodorus whom he ſo much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like diſpute. Aberrârunt verò omnes, non negligentiâ, ſed regnorum ſitûs ignorantiâ; They have all erred (ſaith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the ſituation of Kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah ſtood on the mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the ſame he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth, that 250. years before Ninus, the Earth was overflown with Waters, Et in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; And that in Scythia the ſtock of mortal men was renewed. The ſame Author alſo teacheth, that the Umbri before remembred (who were ſo called, becauſe ſaved from Deucalion's Floud) were the Sons of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his veniſſe Janum cum Dyrim, & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From theſe Scythians, he ſaith, that Janus came with Dyrim, and with the Galli the progenitours of the Umbri: And again, Equidem principatus originis ſemper Scythis tribuitur; Certainly, the prime Antiquity of Off-ſpring is alway given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that thoſe Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by ſome Writers Sarmatia Aſiatica, were among the firſt peopled: and they held the greateſt part of Aſia under Tribute till Ninus Time. Alſo Pliny called the Umbri which long ſince inhabited Italy, Gens antiquiſſima, a moſt ancient Nation, who deſcended of theſe Scythians. Now, that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that theſe ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephews of Noah) did firſt inhabit that Region of the Mountains, on which the Ark reſted; and confeſſing that this great Ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigneth a Nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the Mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And becauſe his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was reſtored after the great Floud 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly deſtroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga; as, In Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga, mankind was reſtored: he therefore in the Proœme of his Commentary upon Beroſus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia ſalvatos. For Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, is nndoubtedly under the Mountains of Parapiniſus; on which, or near which it is moſt probable that the Ark firſt took ground: and from thoſe Eaſt parts (according to Moſes) came all thoſe companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now, the beſt authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were orignally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) we may ſee his vanity, or rather (indeed) his falſhood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a moſt approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with theſe words: Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians Fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this Title to that very Chapter; Scytharum origo & ſucceſſus, fabula; The original and ſucceſs of the Scythians, a Fable. And (indeed) there needs no great diſproof hereof, ſince Ptolomy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, and ſets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Perſians (ſaith Herodotus) call all the Scythians Sacæ; which Pliny confirms: for in reſpect that theſe Sacæ (ſaith Pliny) are the Scythians next to the Perſians, therefore they gave all the reſt that name. Now, that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Perſians, there is no man believeth. But this ſuppoſed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees diſtant from the Sacæ; and the Countrey about Araxes Ptolemy calleth Colthene, and Soducene, and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all thoſe which are, or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus, or without, to the number of 100. ſeveral Nations, are by Ptolomy preciſely ſet down.

But, to come to thoſe latter Authours, whereof ſome have written, others have ſeen a great part of thoſe North-Eaſt Regions, and ſearched their Antiquities with great diligence: Firſt, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without theſe Mountains, is alſo beyond our purpoſe) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea eſt, quæ proprio vocabulo Gaſſaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occaſu Sarmatia Aſiatica: ab Oriente Imao Monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, uſque oſtia Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipſius maris hinc uſq; ad Rha fluminis oſtia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus, is that part of the World which in their own ſpeech is at this time called Gaſſaria; and the ſame is bounded on the Weſt-ſide by Sarmatia Aſiatica, (or of Aſia:) on the Eaſt, by the Imaan Mountains: on the North, by unknown Lands: on the South, by the Saccæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the ſame Sea as farr as the mouth of Rha.

Rha, Now Wolga.

Now, if Niger ſets all Sarmatia Aſiatica to the Weſt of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que magna ſanè Regio eſt, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations, ſaith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth ſufficiently warrant us, that Armenia

Com. 2. Aſiæ fol. 472.

Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he diſſevereth Sarmatia it ſelf from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the Weſt bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nation; neither doth his fellow Friar John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his deſcription of Scythia) make mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian born of the bloud of thoſe Kings (though afterwards a Monk) ever acknowledg himſelf for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races deſcended: though he writ that ſtory at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. publiſhed.

Neither doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Aſiatica, find Armenia any way within the compaſs of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whoſe Travels are extant) hath obſerved ſo much of thoſe Regions as he hath done: proving and diſproving many things, heretofore ſubject to diſpute. And among others he burieth that antient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Riphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, ſpring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanſwerable experience, that there are no ſuch Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of thoſe famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Muſcovia known to every Merchant, and that they ariſe out of Lakes, low, wooddy, and mariſh grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariſeth to the South of the City Tulla, ſome twenty Engliſh miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowesero, in the great Wood Okenitzkilies, or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riſeth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Boryſthenes (now Neyper) and Dſuina or Dividna. And this learned Polonian doth in this ſort bound the Europæan Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Ruſſians, Lithuanians, Muſcovians, and thoſe adjoyning bounded on the Weſt by the River of Viſa, the Name perchance miſ-printed Viſſa for Viſtula, a River which parts Germania and Sarmatia: and for the Eaſt-border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Aſiatica he cutteth from Europe by the ſame River of Tanais, and the Caſpian Sea, to with-hold it from ſtretching farther Eaſt: this Aſian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus. And the ſame Matthias Michon further affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Friar Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Aſiatica it ſelf above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: theſe be his words: Conſtat eam eſſe gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis ſedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Aſiæ Sarmatiam ingreſſam: It is manifeſt (ſaith he, ſpeaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coaſts of the Eaſt: from whence they entred into Aſia, & gat new ſeats a little more than 300. years ſince; For (indeed) before that time the Goths or Poulaci inhabited Sarmatia Aſiatica. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511. and this his Diſcourſe of Sarmatia was Printed at Auguſta in the year 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witneſſeth. Now theſe Scythians (ſaith he) came from the Eaſt; for in the Eaſt it was, that the Ark of Noah reſted, and the Scythæ Sacræ were thoſe people which lived at the North foot of thoſe Mountains, of Taurus. And were there no other teſtimony than the general deſcription of the Earth now extant, and the witneſs of Ptolomy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only thoſe three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caſpian Sea: on the Eaſt ſhore of which Sea, but not on the Weſt, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) between Jaxartus and Jaxius; but what are theſe Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

‖. VIII.

The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neer the place where the Arke reſted.

TO this if we add the conſideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we ſhall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayſin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this reſting of the Arke was ſuppoſed: for if the Vine was a ſtranger in Italy and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder Country. For Tyrrhenus firſt brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at ſuch times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy, there were few or no Vines in France. For (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gaules remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alpes neer unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk Wine, which was firſt brought them out of Italy; and after they taſted thereof, they haſted to inhabite that Country, which brought forth ſuch pleaſant Fruit: ſo as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from elſe-where into Italy.

Gen. 9. 20.

Servulus Aneid Eutropius.

Now it is manifeſt, that Noah travelled not far to ſeek out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counſel how to diſpoſe of the World among his children: and the firſt thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vine-yard, after the Sacrifice and Thankſgiving to God; and whereſoever the Arke reſted, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travelled far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husbandman, and not a wanderer.

An anſwer to an Objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord ſcattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, ſaving that it may be inferred out of theſe words (from thence) becauſe it is written: So that the Lord ſcattered them [from thence] upon all the Earth; which hath no other other sence, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam Cœlum essent ascensuri: Certain of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

‖. X.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the heighth of the Hills there.

BUT before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the Marginal Note of the Geneva: the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it self had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14. Dpiph. l. 1. contr. Hæres.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountains of the World, and yet it doth not follow, that the Ark found the highest Mountain of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Ark. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Books of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Ark stayed after the Floud. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia and not Armenia: they are placed where the City of Cælenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description she maketh mention of Marsyas, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it self with the River Mæander, which is far from the Gordæian Mountain in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Cæron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those days reserved some pieces of Noahs Ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia; for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountains Cordiei was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the Text which Josephus citeth differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandereth up and down in these days, set out by Annius. For Berosus, cited by Josephus, hath these words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Cordieorum superesse, & quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti solent: (which is It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiean Mountains; and that divers do scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. Aut Annius his Edition of the Fragment of Berosus useth these words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordei montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maximè utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Ark being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordiean Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in the two Texts (besides the difference of words) these name is diversly written. The antient Berosus writes Cordiæei with a (C): and the Fragment Gordieei with a (G): the one that the Bitumen is used for a preservative against Poyson or Inchantment; the other, in Sacrifice. And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them, useth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur); the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both but by hear-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountains which Ptolemy calls Gordiæi, are not those Mountaines which himself giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountains of Armenia, Moschici. These be his own words: Montes Armeniæ nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur usque ad superjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & Mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountains of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretched along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryardes: which Mountains Pliny calleth Pariedri, and both which ly to the North of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a half; and the Gordiæan Mountains in 39. and a half: from the Northermost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians, and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, do still remain Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountains of Gordiæi, otherwise Baris, Kardu or Lubar (which Ptolemy calleth Torgodiaion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

FOr the best Cosmographers, with other, that have seen the Mountains of Armenia find them far inferiour, and under-set to to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and elsewhere: as the Mountain Athos between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Lacas, (saith Castaldus) is far surmounting any Mountain that ever hath been seen in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seven and thirty miles and upwards: of which Plutarch, Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bovis: Athos thos ſhadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Alſo the Mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or Rain overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Antandrus in Myſia, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be ſeen from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania neer the Sea, the famous Mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, it a ſublimis eſſe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non poſſint: Upon this Coaſt there is a Mountain called Atlas, whoſe heighth is ſaid to be ſuch as the eye of no mortal man can diſcern the top thereof. And if we may believe Ariſtotle, then are all theſe inferiour to Caucaſus, which he maketh the moſt notorous both for breadth and height: Caucæſus Mons omnium maximus, qui æſtivum ad ortum ſunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cujus juga à Sole radiantur uſq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu: Caucaſus (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the greateſt Mountain both for breadth and heighth of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightned by the Sun-beams (uſq; ad conticinium) which is, ſaith Macrobius, between the firſt crowing after mid-night and the break of day: Others affirm, that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valley; but I cannot believe either, for the higheſt Mountain of the World known, is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Suns company at any ſuch late hours. Beſides, theſe Mountains which Ariſtotle calleth Caucaſi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucaſus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phaſis riſeth in the ſame Mountain, which himſelf calleth Caucaſus, and that Phaſis ſpringeth from thoſe Hills which ſunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifeſt) yieldeth it ſelf to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabeſunda) howſoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

Ariſt. Met. cor. l. 1. c. 13.

‖. XII.

Of divers incongruities if in this Story we ſhould take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth firſt appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the Books of the Sybils ſet it in Phrygia, and Beroſus in Armenia: and as for Beroſus authority, thoſe men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the higheſt Hill, and therefore moſt likely that the Ark grounded thereon, the aſſertion and ſuppoſition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all thoſe of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark ſhould ſit on the higheſt.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any ſuch Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris; for Baris (ſaith Hierom) ſignifieth high Towers; and ſo may all high Hills be called indifferently: and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucaſus (out of which Indus riſeth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For thoſe of Caucaſus in the Eaſt, are undoubtedly the higheſt of Aſia.

Fourthly, the Authors themſelves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordiæi ſtand: for Ptolemy diſtinguiſheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordiean, and calleth thoſe of Armenia, Moſchici and Paryardes, as aforeſaid. Now Paryardes is ſeated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the Weſt ſide riſeth Euphrates, and out of the Eaſt-ſide, Araxis: and the Mountains Moſchici are thoſe Hills which disjoyn Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

‖. XIII.

Of the contrary ſituation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvail that the ſame Ledg of Hills running from Armenia to India, ſhould keep the ſame name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LAſtly, we muſt blow up this Mountain Ararat it ſelf, or elſe we muſt dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it elſewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) ſet it Eaſt from Shinaar; or elſe we ſhall wound the Truth it ſelf with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the miſtaking open to every eye, we muſt underſtand, that Ararat (named by Moſes) is not any one Hill, ſo called, no more then any one Hill among thoſe Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among thoſe which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian: But as theſe, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in divers Countries, ſo all that long Ledg of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they Incounter and croſs the Mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, becauſe from thence or thereabout they ſeem to ariſe. So all theſe Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caſpii, Moſchici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diverſly called by Pliny and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucaſus, lying between the Seas Caſpiam and Euxinus: as all thoſe Mountains which cut aſunder America, even from the new Kingdom of Granado, to the ſtreight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as theſe Mountains of Ararat run Eaſt and Weſt, ſo do thoſe maryailous Mountains of Imaus ſtretch themſelves North and South; and being of like extent well-neer, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Pliny called theſe former Hills Taurus, and Moſes the Hills of Ararat. The reaſon of ſeveral names given by Ptolemie, was, thereby the better to diſtinguiſh the great Regions and Kingdoms, which theſe great Mountains bound and diſſever; as Armenia, Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Media, Suſiana, Perſia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropaniſus: having all theſe Kingdoms, either on the North or South ſide of them. For all the mountains of Aſia (both the leſs and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucaſus: and they receive other titles, as they ſever and divide particular Places and Regions. For theſe Mountains which ſunder Cilicia from the reſt of Aſia the leſs, on the North-ſide, are called Taurus; and thoſe

Pliny in his diſcription of Lycia. l. 5. c. 27.

Mountains which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the Mountains called Taurus, running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus, the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East-side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolemie's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, untill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southern part whereof the River of Bagradus riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the Mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yielding her self to Oxus (now Abia:) and drawing now near their ways end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly, of Caucasia, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions, Hydaspis and Zaredrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountains in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolemie) that is, between Paropanisus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountain Caucasi, and toward the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the Soil.

NOw, in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nyseus, (so called of Bacchus Nyseus, or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the World did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Flouds; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-Scythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, and 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judæa, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the Land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bigness at Escol. Numb. 13. 24.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana, near the Mountains of Meros, did Alexander feast himself and his Army ten days together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

¶. XV.

The Conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is known by the name of Ararat. But, as Pliny giveth to this Ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paraponisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions, and divers Countreys. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterrane and in-land Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Jonium: from Venice Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Ægeum: between Sestus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this side, the Brittain Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Question, we must appeal to that Judge which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sence: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sence is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange exposition; And (withall) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us, touching the Gospel of Christ Jesus (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel) the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

The words then of Moses, which end this Dispute are these: And as they went from the East, they found Gen. 11. 2.

a Plain in the Land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proveth without controverſie, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the Eaſt into Shinaar; and therefore the Ark of Noah reſted and took land to the Eaſt-ward thereof. For we muſt remember, that in all places whereſoever Moſes maketh a difference of Countreys, he always preciſely nameth toward what quarter of the World the ſame were ſeated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Joctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mountain in the Eaſt:
*Gen.*10.30. where he remembreth Cains departure from the preſence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the Eaſt-ſide of Eden: And when he deſcribeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham, after he departed from Sechem, he uſeth theſe words; Afterwards removing thence
*Gen.*4.16. unto a Mountain Eaſt-ward from Bethel, he pitched
*Gen.*12.8. his Tents: having Bethel on the Weſt-ſide, and Hai on the Eaſt: and afterward in the ninth Verſe of the ſame Chapter, it is written; And Abraham went
*Ezek.*38.6. forth journeying towards the South: alſo when Ezekiel propheciеth of Gog and Magog, he ſheweth that theſe Nations of Togorma were of the North-quar-
*Mat.*12.42. ters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, that ſhe came from the South to viſit Solomon: And the *Mat.*2.1. Magi, (or Wiſemen) came out of the Eaſt to offer preſents unto Chriſt. And that all Regions, and theſe travels were preciſely ſet down upon the points of the Compaſs and Quarters of the World, it is moſt manifeſt: for Eden was due Eaſt from Judæa; Saba South from Hieruſalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Cæleyrians, the Tubalines, and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Paleſtina, and ſo of the reſt. But Armenia anſwereth not to this deſcription of Shinaar by Moſes. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babyſonia, is not a journeying from the Eaſt, nor ſo near unto the Eaſt as the North: for Armenia is to the Weſt of the North it ſelf; and we muſt not ſay of Moſes (whoſe hands the holy Ghoſt directed) that he erred toto cælo, and that he knew not Eaſt from Weſt. For the body of Armenia ſtandeth in fourty three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in fourty five; and thoſe Gordiæan Mountains, whereon it was ſuppoſed that the Ark reſted, ſtand in fourty one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are ſituated in thirty five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between Eaſt and Weſt) the Gordiæan Mountains ſtand in 75. degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-weſt, 95. degrees from the Eaſt; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the Eaſt one whole quarter of the Compaſs. But Gregory, and Hierome warn us, In Scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam ſinguli ſermones, ſyllabæ, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena ſunt ſenſibus; In the Scriptures the leaſt difference may not be omitted: for every ſpeech, ſyllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are repleniſhed with their meanings. And therefore ſeeing Moſes teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the Eaſt, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who alſo ſpeak by hear-ſay, and by report, Ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Beroſus and Nicolaus Damaſcenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth Weſt from the place where the Ark of Noah reſted after the Floud; and therefore it firſt found ground in the Eaſt, from whence came the firſt knowledg of all things. The Eaſt parts were firſt civil, which had Noah himſelf for an inſtructor, and directly Eaſt from Shinaar in the ſame degree of 35. are the greateſt Grapes, and the beſt Wine. The great Armies alſo which overſpread in number thoſe Millions of Semiramis, prove, that the Eaſt parts were firſt Planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Realon ſufficient: for my ſelf I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, That the Sons of Noah came out of the Eaſt into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark reſt on thoſe Eaſtern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moſes the Mountains of Ararat, and not on thoſe Mountains of the North-weſt, as Beroſus firſt feigned, whom moſt part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I ſay, in the plentiful warm Eaſt where Noah reſted, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ ſtudium, in qua tractanda ipſe omnium peritiſſimus eſſe dicitur: ob eamque rem ſua ipſius lingua Iſh-Adamath (hoc eſt) telluris vir appellatur celebratuſque eſt, The ſtudy of Husbandry pleaſed Noah (ſaith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledg and order of which it is ſaid that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language, a man exerciſed in the earth. Which alſo ſheweth, that he was no wanderer; and that he troubled not himſelf with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but ſtayed in his deſtined places, and in that part of the World where he was firſt deliver'd out of the Priſon of the Ark, whereunto God had committed him, to preſerve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

SECT I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder then Japhet.

Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 16. c. 3.

OF these Sons of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversie; The Latine Translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius, agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and brother of Japhet the eldest Son, were children born: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar Translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these Translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise different) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japhet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundreth year of his life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundreth year (to wit) the hundreth year following, came the general Floud; two years after which, Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so as Shem was but an hundred years old, two years after the Floud: and Noah begat his first born being 500. years old; and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an hundred years old at the Floud, and in the six hundreth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his Wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son, so converted by the Vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it filius minimus, his youngest son; but St. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest son of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakedness he derided) was dis-inherited, and lost the preeminency of his birth, as Esau and Ruben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place; yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet, in the second Verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, Shem Frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius and Tremelius, Shem Fratris Japhet majoris; or with Pererius, Shem Frater Japhet ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former argument, That Shem's age at the time of the Floud did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the Floud; and again in the 12. Verse: So Shela lived after he begat Ebar, four hundred and three years, &c. so as the number of two years, of three years, of five years, and afterward of two years, were always precisely accounted.

SECT.

SECT. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that known great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

But let us go unto the Worlds plantation after the Floud, which being rightly understood; we shall find that many Nations have supposed or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approched the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the sons and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the World was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so far as the story of Nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth and antiquity of the Books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, and testimony of antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which, thus writeth Eusebius in the Proæme of his Chronology: Moses is found more antient than all those the Grecians make most antient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan War; and far before Hercules, Musæus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Castor, Pollux, Æsculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the rest of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have seated in the top and highest Turret of their Divinity.

Cicero de Nat. Deorum. l. 3.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by Cicero, the antienteſt was the ſon of Æther, whoſe three ſons begotten on Proſerpina, were born at Athens, of which Cecrops was the firſt King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moſes bring the children of Iſrael out of Egypt: Eduxit Moſes populum Dei ex Egypto noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſis Regis; Moſes brought the Children of Iſrael out of Egypt in the laſt days of Cecrops King of the Athenians, ſaith S. Auguſtine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of that City it ſelf, but Theſeus long after him. But becauſe the truth hereof is diverſly proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut aſunder the purpoſe in hand, by alledging many authorities in a needleſs queſtion, but leave it to the proper place.

De Civit. Dei l. 18. c. 11.

The Sons of Japhet were Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meſhach, and Tiras.
The Sons of Gomer were Askenaz, Riphath, Togorma.
The Sons of Javan were Eliſha, Tarſhis, Kittim, and Dodonim.

First, we are to conſider, that the World after the Floud was not planted by imagination, neither had the Children of Noah wings to fly from Shinaar to the uttermoſt border of Europe, Africa, and Aſia, in haſte, but that theſe Children were directed by a wiſe Father, who knew thoſe parts of the World before the Floud, to which he diſpoſed his children after it, and ſent them not as diſcoverers, or at all-adventure, but aſſigned and alloted to every Son and their iſſues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authours, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Æneas) or elſe to glorifie their own nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themſelves, and after them, upon Reaſon and Nature. Firſt therefore we muſt call to mind, and conſider, what manner of face the Earth every where had in the 130. year after the great Inundation, and by comparing thoſe fruitfulleſt Valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our ſelves thereby, what wonderful Deſarts, what impaſſable fatneſs of woods, reeds, briers, and rotten graſs; what lakes and ſtanding pools, and what mariſhes, fens, and bogs, all the face of the Earth (excepting the Mountains) was peſtered withall. For, if in this our Climate (where the dead and deſtroying Winter depreſſeth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one half of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, theſe our grounds would all over-grow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods, or with other offenſive thickets and buſhments: much more did all ſorts of plants, reeds, and trees, proſper in the moſt fruitful Valleys, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withall, the ſtart of 130. years to raiſe themſelves without controlement.

This being conſidered, it will appear, that all theſe people which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod, either by order or ſtrength, took the Dominion, did, after the confuſion of Languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty People, diſperſe themſelves into the Regions adjoyning to the ſaid Valley of Shinaar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, ſome of them towards the South, others towards the Weſt and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both Eaſt and Weſt from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Paleſtina, which the Canaanites firſt poſſeſt; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his Inheritance on the ſudden, but by time and degrees. For we find that Abraham, the true ſucceſſour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldæa, at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he reſted at Charran in Meſopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he travelled to Sichem in Paleſtina: and yet there had paſſed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themſelves) ſeven Deſcents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldæa; where, and in Babylonia, all thoſe people, by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Aſſyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed, the great Maſters of Nations (as far as we can know) were in that Age in the iſſues of Ham; the bleſſing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking leſs effect, untill divers years were conſumed; and untill the time arrived, which by the wiſdome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt for many Deſcents together.

SECT.

SECT. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhet's Portion: of Berosus his too speedy seating Gomer the Son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's Sons, Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the Sons of Japheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhet's Sons, as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the division were made at Phaleg's birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the years after the Floud one hundred and one; of which question else-where.

The habitations proper to the Sons of Japhet were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe, with all the Isles adjoyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ægeum, Bosphorus, and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it self is (in effect) surrounded with water, saving that it is fastned to Asia by the North; for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterrane to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale, to the North, North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyelades, or Isles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittanie, and Zeland, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of
Gen. 9. 27. God by Noah, Dilatet Deus Japheth; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Junius here useth the word alliciat, and not dilatet: and the Geneva, persuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet, or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of God's Church. But to come to Japhet's Sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Annius, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reign, depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth year of Nimrod's Reign, Gomerus Gallus planted a Colony in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same Nimrod's Reign, Tubal seated himself in Austria in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. years after the Floud, according to Berosus. But this opinion is very ridiculous: For before the confusion of Tongues, the Children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building of such a City and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his Authour Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem Montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountains. Sure that both this City and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witness: but the Lord came down to see the City and Tower which the Sons of men had builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Brick to such a Work, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universal Floud covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a City and Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they Gen. c. 11. would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the highest Mountain, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second Inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly over-bearing and over-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest; approved also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial foundation for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which Glycas upon Genesis giveth fourty years. For it seemeth that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written; So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now, to think that this Gen. 11. work, in the newness of the World, (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year, could creep through 3000. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattel: Let those light believers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Ark of Noah was 100. years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. years; it were more than foolishness and madness it self, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Floud to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. years, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their Pliny. helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400. years (or be it but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages: This Work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few years remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of judgment weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family

Funct. Chronol.

Family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattel, to travel 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a work of 100. years than of 100. days. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrods people spent many years by the account before remembred in passing from the East India, or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. degrees of Longitude, untill they came into Shinaar, which lieth in 79. degrees (the distance between those places containing 36. degrees, which makes 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keep the Mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the body of Biscay lyeth in ten degrees, and Babylon, or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79: so the length of way from Shinaar to Austria, or Biscay, is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Ark rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000. miles, to Countries less known unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the Floud: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what he understood of most part of the World else, it is unknown. And therefore did Annius ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods Reign: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be born at once? But it may be objected, That the Sons of Japheth might come by Sea, and so save this great travel through Desarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in those days, nor long after. Surely, he that knoweth what it is to imbarque so great a People, as we may justly suppose those Conductors carried with them, will not easily believe that there were any Vessels in those days to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattel, by whose milk they lived, and fed their children: For milk and fruit were the banquetting dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Herds and numbers of their Cattel: who had Flocks of Sheep, and great Droves and Herds of their own, and their own Shepherds and Herdsmen. Now, if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palæstina, Syria, or Silicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granado, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Tract; past the Streights of Gibralter; disdained all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countreys; and have sought out the Iron, Woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were scarce any Vessels that durst cross the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Jason had (if the tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance, such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carried but four and fifty passengers, yet it was far greater than any of the former times: Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small vessels. I deny not, but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of Ships to them:

Isai. 66. v. 8.

Diod. Sicul. l. 4. c. 4. fol. 115.

Prima ratem ventis credere docta Tyros. Tibull. Eleg. 7.

And for those Boats called Longæ naves, or Gallies, Pliny saith, that Ægesias ascribeth the device to Paralus: and Philostephanus, to Jason: Ctesias, to Samyras; and Saphanus, to Semiramis: Archimacus, to Ægeon: to which invention the Erythræi are said to have added certain numbers of Oars: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to have increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four Banks: the Quinque Remi first to have been used by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels, in those parts of the World, the Romans served themselves in the Punick War. But these be perhaps, but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis used them in the passage of her Army over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first brought a Ship into Greece; and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention: and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) gives it to Minerva: others, to Neptune; Thucydides, to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians used to coast the shores of the Red-Sea upon rafts, devised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britans had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have seen at the Dingle in Ireland, and else-where. Naves ex corio circumsutæ in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor:) of which Lucan the Poet:

Diod. Sicul. l. 1. Plin. l. 7. cap. 56. Thucid. Plin. l. 7. cap. 56. Euseb. de præp. Evang. c. 1. Tert. de Coron. mil.

Of a proud River, lightly doth it float

So on the Lakes of over-swelling Poe

On th'out-spread Ocean.

And although it cannot be denied, when Noah, by Gods inspiration, was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Ark, then many things concerning Navigation were revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Ark of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long voyages to Sea, at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattel; as also common reason can tell us, that even now, when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesom and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or use of Ships, fit for any long navigation. For, if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would would not have been dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countreys far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joyned both Nature, Reason, Policie, and Necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

SECT. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Meshech, seated first about Asia the less; out of Ezechiel, Chap. 38. 39.

NOw, although many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus, was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall, so was he in the Plantation of the World very gross and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his testimonies for currant, have been by him far miss-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the Son of Japhet possest, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures takes most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince, or chief Conductor, in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japhets Issues possest, all Asia the Less was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Japheth (whom Ezekiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependency upon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter Ezechiel propheseth of the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Israel and Juda, after their delivery from Captivity. Chap. 37. v. 19.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And David my servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one Shepherd, (that is) they shall be united as they were in Davids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel propheseth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Union, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their return, and sought to subject them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cœlosyrians, next bordering Palæstina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the less, which lay North from Judea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Son of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chief Princes of Meshech (or Moschi) and Tubal: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth Verse; Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanity assayl Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierom) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane form. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (m) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of, or, from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pintus; at least in this not amiss, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which agreeth this observation of Beroaldus, Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Heliajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech (or Moschi) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seek to make the Jews their Tributaries only, but indeavoured by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguish the Religion it self (which the Hebrews profess'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. S. Ambrose, and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barburus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turks from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a man: others, of a Region, others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who says that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greek Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Rivers of Hillus, and Mæander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who, after he had subdued the Country about the River Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontory Trapese after his own name Gyges. These Opinions do also seem to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the less, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Son Crœsus; who (as Junius further notes) notes) having mastered all those Regions as farr South as Libanus, in that Border built the City Gigarta, or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the City of Gog) seated in Cœlosyria, whose People were the ancient Enemies of the Jews.

Now, that Magog is found in Cœlosyria, Pliny affirmeth, saying; Cœlosyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur: Syris verò, Magog; Cœlosyria hath in it Bambyce, which in another name is called Hieropolis; but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us, that the monstrous Idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Derceto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying, That the City had anciently another name, which he yet expresseth not; forbearing, perhaps, the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may believe Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia, the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idol was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce, or Hierapolis, It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due North from Palæstina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now, I do not condemn the Opinion of Hermolaus Babarus following Josephus, but grant that, perhaps, Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cœlosyria, and the North parts adjoyning be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might be propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-east, wasted the better part of Asia the less, and possest Cœlosyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plain: for this City Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judæa, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North-quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successors of Seleucus, the Successors of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Story of Tobias. Pliny takes it not onely to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that of Euphrates; but another of the same name: now, the known name is Aleppo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This City had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred City, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idol of the Mermaid Atergates, or Atergitis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Derceto.

Lib. 4. cap. de bello sacro

If then we confer the words of Ezechiel in the third Verse of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withall remember that Hierapolis was the City of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judæa: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judæa) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Cœlosyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to latter times, and think that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia pass into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these people might from their first habitation, pass into the Countries neer the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were antiently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Justine) they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Country, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes, lived altogether by the Exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them:

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimento ministrant.

The Calybes plough not their barren soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toil
For Merchandize, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawn to pass over the Streights into that Countrey: and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts, eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth year of Nimrods Reign, Tubal past into Spain, and therein built Saint Uval: a poor Town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we must find Moshoch or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their assistants. And that Meshech inhabited Asia, Functius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: Mesacus, qui à Mose Mesech, priscos Mesios ab Adula monte usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc est terra Magog principalis; Mesacus, whom Moses calleth Mesech, placed the ancient Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coasts of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mazica, &c. this is the principal Countrey of Magog. And this doth Annius also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and not North from Judea. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal jointly. And for a final proof, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far soever stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude, and a mighty. Then, if any man believe that these troups came out of Spain over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued again about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is half the length or compass of the then known World; he may be called a strong Believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary, it is known that Seleucis was a Province neighbouring Palestina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the less, (namely; the Seleucida) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which yet they possest Syria, till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himself with Togarma, not farr from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the less; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germany, rested long in France and Brittany, and possessed the utmost borders of the Earth, accomplishing (as Melanchon well notes) the signification of their Parents name, which is Utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the Nations occupying the Countreys, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Restorer of our Antiquities, M. William Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessity inforcing them to spoil their Neighbours, to whom in their original, they were as near joyned, as afterwards in the seats which they possessed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authority of Cæsar affirming it, is proof sufficient. But in times following, they pursued richer Conquests, and more easie, though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawn at length into Asia the less, and occupied those parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitours. I say not that they claimed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now, concerning Samothes, for his excellent wisdome, sirnamed Dis, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japheths Sons) they must find him in some old Poet: For Functius, a great Berosian, confesseth: Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum est; Who this Samothes was, it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that same Dis, whom Cæsar saith the Gaules suppose to be their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confesseth with Functius: Mays on ne scayt qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

SECT. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

But before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it is necessary to disprove the Fiction which Annius hath of Noah himself: an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himself hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annius seeks to perswade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92. years. This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For, if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineve, by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. years. But it were a needless labour for me to disprove the authority of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that Tartianus the Assyrian, in his Oration against the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Books dedicated to Antiochus the Successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annius hath devised five Books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldæans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the business of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) consumed but 150. years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arrival into Italy, there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz in the Worlds year (as some reckon) 2717. after the Floud 1064. and Noah died 350. years after the Floud: and so there past between Janus of Italy, and Noah surnamed Janus, 704 years. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now, all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fifty years, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

Joseph. l. 1.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth Son of Japheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the Son of Medea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a farr more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japheth.

Ezech. 27. 19, 23. and so the place of Esa. 66. 19. (for Javan) Hellada: and (for the Plural Javanim) Hellenes.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained among us above 2000. years, and the English Speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some ſome corruption and alteration. Therefore it is ſtrange, if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain reſemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian, (which no time could have quite extinguiſhed) ſhould have been found in the Languages of thoſe Countreys. For which reaſons we doubt not but theſe perſonal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. In Italy, Spain, or France, are meerly fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themſelves with the Grecian Janus which commanded them, and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. years (ſaith Euſebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fifth King: which alſo Saint Auguſtine and Juſtine confirm: and this agreeth with reaſon, time, and poſſibility. And if this be not ſufficient to diſprove this vanity, I may out of themſelves add thus much; That whereas ſome of them make Veſta (others Camaſena) the wife of this Janus, who inſtituted the holy Fire of the Veſtal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Hetheniſh Ceremonies) there is no man ſo impious, as to believe that Noah himſelf (who is ſaid by Moſes to have walked with God, to be a juſt man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or ſo wicked and ungrateful, to ſet up or deviſe any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have inſtituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew beſt pleaſing to God himſelf.

SECT VI.

That Gomer alſo and his Son Togorma of the Poſterity of Japheth, were firſt ſeated about Aſia the Leſs: and that from thence they ſpread Weſtward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Floud: therein I obſerve, that as both reaſon and neceſſity taught them; ſo, when they multiplied in great numbers, and diſperſed themſelves into the next Countreys bordering to their firſt habitations, and from thence ſent forth Colonies elſewhere, it was in ſuch manner, as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River: becauſe the Land was yet Deſart, and overpreſt with Woods, Reeds, Boggs, and rotten Mariſhes. As when Nimrod ſeated in Babylonia, Chuſh took the South part of Chaldæa down the River of Gehon, by which he might paſs to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: thoſe alſo, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur, or Orchoa, near the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the ſame River get up to Babylon, and receive ſuccour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moſes, in the deſcription of Paradiſe, calleth the Land of Chuſh: becauſe the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chuſhite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and ſtayed not in the Eaſt) were for a while oppreſt, till God afterward by the ſeed of Abraham made them his own Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and ſon of Chuſh, took both Banks of Tygris, eſpecially on the Eaſt ſide of the River: by which River his people might alſo paſs to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial Seat of which Region of Havilah or Suſian, was anciently called Chuſian or Chuſan, afterward Suſa. Chuſh himſelf took the Banks of Gehon, and planted thoſe Countries Weſt-ward, and Southweſt-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Deſart, where Ptolemy placeth the City of Chuſidia, firſt Chuſia. Ptol. Aſiæ Tab. 4.

Seba, and Sheba, with the reſt that planted Arabia fœlix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Perſian gulf, which waſheth the Banks of Arabia fœlix on the Eaſt-ſide: ſo as thoſe Sons of Cuſh might take Land down the River as they pleaſed. Alſo the City of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the ſaid River of Tygris, and from thence a Colony paſs'd to Charran, ſtanding alſo upon a navigable Branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japhet's Sons ſettle themſelves together, and took their Seats in Aſia the leſs; from whence they might indifferently ſtretch themſelves Northward and Weſtward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Iſles of the Gentiles. And it ſeemeth very agreeable to Reaſon, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal ſate down firſt of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palæſtina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer, or his Children, paſs'd on into Aſia the leſs, as thoſe of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines ſpred themſelves into Iberia; and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatian. The firſt Gomerians, and firſt Planters in Aſia the leſs, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witneſs Herodotus) the ſame Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epiſtle ſo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards diſperſed, and forced from their firſt Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountains about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia: alſo Boſphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was alſo a City of that name, called Cymmerian: which Pliny ſaith (miſtaking the place) had ſometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Town in Campania, ſo called of the unhealthful waters ſavouring of Brimſtone, which Auguſtus cauſed to be cleanſed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus. Lib. 4.

The Children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Moſchiſci were Neighbours, which others write Meſhech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meſchech and Tubal. For theſe Meſchi (which Ptolomy calleth Moſchi inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountains Moſchici, in the Valley between the Mountains Moſchici, and the Mountains Pariardes: out of whoſe North part ſpringeth the River Phaſis; from the Eaſt part Araxis; and from the Weſt Euphrates: and of this Meſchech are deſcended alſo the Moſcovians (ſaith Melanthon) and it may be, that in proceſs of time ſome of them inhabitated thoſe Regions alſo: For Meſhech ſaith Melanthon) ſignifieth extendens, enlarging or ſtretching forth. Togorma alſo at firſt did inhabit amongſt his Parents and Kindred: The Togormians were alſo called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phœnicia, the ſame which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Solomon had his moſt excellent Maſons, which hewed ſtones for the Temple of Jeruſalem. Thence the Togormians ſtretched into the leſs Armenia, whoſe Kings were hence called Jun. in Gen. 10. vers. 3. 1 King. 5. 18.

called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokartæ: of which Cities, Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieroſolytanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary, forgetting the Propheſie of Ezechiel againſt the Tyrians: They of the houſe of Togorma, brought to thy Fairs, Horſes, and Horſemen, and Mules; which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterrane Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by Land. But Joſephus takes them for the Parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be, in the enſuing Ages; and ſo might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of thoſe Togormians, becauſe their Emperour is called Togor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germans. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks deſcended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muſcovia. But for theſe ſubderivations it were infinit to examine them. Only of the firſt and ſecond Plantation, and of the firſt Nations after the Flood, is the matter which I labour to diſcover; and therein to open the ignorance of ſome, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we muſt Note, That thoſe Grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of leſs underſtanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies ſent out, their proper habitations could be hardly known: only reaſon hath taught us, that they dwelt among the reſt, and were covered with the fame of others who took on them the Conduction and Dominion over the reſt.

Judg. 17. 14.

Note.

From Madai the third Son of Japheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the Son of Media.

SECT. VII.

Of Javan the fourth Son of Japheth: and of Meſech of Aram, and Meſhech of Japheth.

OF Javan the fourth Son of Japheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and ſo the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Eſay, Et mittam ex iis qui ſalvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will ſend thoſe that eſcape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here uſeth the word (Tarſhiſh) for Tarſus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarſis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva uſe the names of Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the ſame Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themſelves dream that they were Alborigines, or men without Anceſtors, and growing (as it were) out of the Soyl it ſelf: who abounding in people, ſent Colonies into Aſia the leſs, of whom came the Iones of thoſe parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion; but the Antiquity of Javan mars the faſhion of that ſuppoſition, who ſo many years preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pauſanias tells us, that Xuthus ſtole out of Theſſaly with all his Fathers Treaſure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciouſly received by Erichtheus, who gave him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he received two Sons, Ion and Achæus, the ſuppoſed Anceſtors of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, ſaith Plutarch in the life of Theſeus;) who, when he had joyned Megara to Attica, erected a Pillar in that Iſthmos or Strait, which faſteneth Peloponneſus to the other part of Greece; writing on that part which looketh towards the Eaſt, theſe words: Hæc non ſunt Peloponneſus, aſt Ionia; The Countries are not Peloponneſus, but of Ionia; and on the other ſide which looketh towards the South, and into Peloponneſus, this: Theſe parts are Peloponneſus, and not Ionia.

Thucyd.

Strabo out of Hecateus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Aſia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece tranſporting certain companies into Aſia the leſs, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themſelves, yet I find this conjecture of Hæcateus reaſonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet ſure I am that Aſia the leſs had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but took Aſia the leſs in his paſſage; and from thence paſt over the neereſt way, leaving his own name to ſome maritimate Province on that ſide, as he did to that part of Greece ſo called. But yet Strabo himſelf believed, that Ionia took the name from Ion the ſon of Xuthus; for ſo much he had learned from themſelves: which was alſo the opinion of Pauſanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times caſt themſelves into that part of Aſia the Leſs, oppoſite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howſoever the Greeks vaunt themſelves to be Fathers of Nations, and the moſt antient; yet all approved Hiſtorians (not their own) deride and diſprove their pride and vanity therein. For this diſpute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) reſted between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Juſtine out of Trogus, in the War between Vexorus of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witneſſeth: which preceded far the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is alſo manifeſt, that in Cecrops time the Greeks were all Salvages, without Law or Religion, living like brute Beaſts in all reſpects: and Cecrops (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) lived together with Moſes.

The ſixth ſon of Japheth was Meſhech, whom the Septuagint call Moſech (a part of thoſe Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Meſhech and Tubal.) But this we muſt remember, that between Meſech the ſon of Aram, and Meſhech (or Moſech) the ſon of Japheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diverſly written. Montanus, with the Vulgar, writeth Meſech, the ſon of Aram, Mes; the Geneva, Maſh; Junius, Meſeh. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Pſalm, that either Meſhech the ſon of Japheth, was the parent of thoſe people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himſelf: or elſe (which may rather ſeem) that it took name from Meſeh the ſon of Aram. For David bewayling his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) uſeth theſe words: Wo is me that I remain in Meſech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus; Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this ſence: Wo is me becauſe my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus eſt, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwiſe, and in theſe words: O me miſerum, quia quia peregrinatus ſum Aſianis, habitavi Cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among thoſe of Aſia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howſoever or which ſoever converſion be taken for the beſt, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldean putteth Aſia in ſtead of Meſech, but the Hebrew it ſelf hath Meſech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is moſt likely, becauſe it anſwers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) ſeeing Meſch the ſon of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Meſech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Meſech or Meſch both bordering Judæa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for ſo Ezechiel makes Meſech and Tubal. But as for thoſe that take Meſech out of the word Moſoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muſcovian: ſure they preſume much upon the affinity of names, as aforeſaid. Sure I am that David never travelled ſo far North (for to him Muſcovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his perſecution: the ſame being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Moſoch the Father of the Muſcovians: and herein alſo Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and ſets Meſech in Muſcovia, though with ſome better advice of judment; as, firſt ſeated in Cappadocia, and from thence travailing Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Pſalm, (Hei mihi quod exulo in Meſech) to ſignifie, Gentis ejus feritatem inſignem eſſi; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fierceneſs or brutality of the Muſcovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the ſame ferity or cruelty which thoſe Northern Muſcovians had, may aſwell be aſcribed to the Arabians and Kedariens. For this Country took name of Kedar the ſecond ſon of Iſmael, of whom a people of equal fierceneſs to any of the World were begotten, both in thoſe times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Iſmalites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the ſame being fore-ſhewed by the ſpeech of the Angel to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he ſhall be a wilde man: his hand ſhall be againſt every man, and every mans hand againſt him. Now Arabia the Deſart (ſaith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the Eaſt, and the Cedræi Southward, both which joyn together upon the Nabathæi. So it appeareth (as before) that Meſech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Iſrael, and that Kedar alſo did joyn to Meſech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Aſia the Leſs, commanded by the ſucceſſors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-eſtabliſhment of Iſrael and Juda. But (as I have already ſaid) it might well be, that long after the firſt Plantation the iſſue of Meſech (or Moſoch) might paſs into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names both to Mezaga in the one, and to the Mountains Moſchici in the other, and from thence might ſend people more Northerly in Muſcovia, and ſo all opinions ſaved. But all ſalvage Nations over-grown and uncultivated, do (for the moſt part) ſhew a late Plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witneſs antiquity.

Lib. 18. de Civ. Dei. c. 10.

Pſal. 120. v. 5.

Gen. 15. 13.

Tyras, the ſeventh ſon of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the ſons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Joſephus was the firſt that determined hereof: and becauſe the Scriptures are altogether ſilent, what part of the World Tyras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of diſpute. It followeth now to ſpeak of the Sons of Gomer; which were three.

Mont. in Chr.

Aſcanez, Riphath, and Togorma.

SECT. VIII.

Of Aſcanez and Riphath the two elder Sons of Gomer.

Aſcanez was the Father of thoſe which the Greeks call Regini, (ſaith Joſephus) but he gives no reaſon why.

Euſebius makes Aſcanez the Father of the Goths. The Jews in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their expoſitions are commonly very Idle. Pliny findeth Aſcania in Phrygia, neer the Rivers of Hilas and Cios: Melanchton being of the ſame opinion, that the Tuiſcones were deſcended of the Aſcanez: (for Tuiſcones, ſaith he, is as much to ſay, as of the Aſcanez, præpoſito articulo die Aſcanes) and that the word ſignifieth, a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an antient ſuperſtition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the Lake Aſcania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the Kings which came to the ſuccour of Troy, was Aſcanius (Deo ſimilis, ſaith Homer) like unto God: becauſe he was beautifull and ſtrong: for in the ſame manner doth Virgil grace Æneas, Os humeroſque Deo ſimilis: In face and body like one of the gods: Virgil alſo remembreth ſuch a River, together with the Hills Gurgara: as Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſque ſonantem Aſcanium; Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara, and the roaring Aſcanius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the deſcription of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Aſcanius, which is adjoyning to Myſia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Aſcanez he directs us to find by the deſcription of Pruſia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth farr within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Pruſia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lieth, even between Pruſia and Nicea. And ſo Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Aſcanez, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and thoſe North parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Aſcanius the Son of Æneas: ſaying, that there was another of that name in Myſia. Of Aſcania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witneſſeth: and Strabo giveth Aſcania both a Lake, a River and a Town in Myſia, near unto Cio; which alſo agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Pruſia (before ſpoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Iſlands before Troy, Aſcanes.

Melanch. in Car. lib. 1.

Hom. Iliad. 2.

Virg. Geor. l. 3.

Now, whether theſe places took name of Aſcanez the Son of Gomer, or of Aſcanius the Son of Æneas, it might be queſtioned; ſure it is, that Aſcanius which brought ſuccour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Æneas Son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it ſeemeth that the Countreys whence thoſe ſuccours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Myſia, but farther off, and from the North parts of Aſia the leſs, which by Hieremy is called Aſcanez, by the figure Synechdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of thoſe teſtimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy we ſhall learn of what Nation the Aſcanez were;

Cap. 51. v. 27. were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanez, against her, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Intepreters consent, so called of the Mountains of Ararat which run through it: Minni, the lesser Armenia; Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name (saith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palæstina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Story of Jacob and Esau, call it Aram-Padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Ascanez joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoil of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Askenez Germany, or Almain: for we hear of no swart Rutiers at that siege. But the Askenez were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any one of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in after-times without acount. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will think as they do.

Of Riphath, the second Son of Gomer, there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius, think that he wandred from far off the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his Plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seat himself with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no room or soil in those days for all the Sons and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greeks afterwards (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (saith Melanchthon) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polæ: which being first called Riphei for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names, and became Heneti (a custom exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (saith Melanchthon) of a warmer soil of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti, or Veneti, whom Melanchthon taketh to be one people, filled all the Baltick and Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the Plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterwards Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time, Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly between the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchthon) signifieth wandering, or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by White-meats and Fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Melanct. Carion.

Of the third Son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javan's Children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodonim.

SECT. IX.

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.

OF Elisa, or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greeks were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchthon makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: Others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greeks were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that Æoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa his eldest Son. Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa, Hyacinthus & purpuris de insulis Elisæ facta sunt operiment tuum: Blue silk and purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was their covering. The Chaldæans for Eliza, write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius, keep the word Elisa: and so I think they might do with reason. For there is not found any such Purple-Die in Italy in those days, nor since that I can read of: but those of Elisa were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Getulia. Vers. 7.

Tharsis the second Son of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldæan Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldæan Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Solomons Ships were prepared in the Red-Sea at Esion-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, near unto Madian, where Jethro (Moses Father-in-law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petrea, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sailed to the higher part of the East-India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three years in the passage between Judæa and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been sailed in six or ten days. And if so great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterrane Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Solomon is in this sort written of, in the first of Kings: Also King Solomon made a Navie of Ships in Esion-Gaber, which is beside Elath, and the brink of the Red-Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Navie his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations of Pontus thought no Sea in the World like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea than that of the Meditterrane in the beginning; and that the people of Tharſis had the greateſt Ships, and were the firſt Navigators in thoſe parts with ſuch Veſſels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharſis uſed often for the Sea. And whereas it is ſaid that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharſis, that phraſe is not ſtrange at all; for we uſe it ordinarily whereſoever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea; or that they are ſet out every year, or every three years to the Sea, and therefore Tharſis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but uſed for the Sea it ſelf. But in this place, Tharſis is truly taken for Tharſis, the chief City in Cilicia, founded by Tharſis the ſecond Son of Javan, or by his Succeſſors in memory of their firſt Parent. To this City arrived Alexander Macedon, before he gave the firſt overthrow to Darius, and caſting himſelf into the River to bathe and waſh his body, he fell into an extreme Feaver, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharſis was S. Paul born. Now, this agreeth with the reaſon and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other Sons inhabiting Aſia the leſs, and that part of Syria adjoyning) Javan, who was to paſs over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the ſame Coaſt, and firſt planted the Iones on that ſhore: gave the Iſlands between Aſia the leſs and Greece to Eliſa, and left Tharſis upon the Sea-ſide in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third Son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, ſaith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (ſaith he) and ſignifies percuſſores, though in that reſpect it may be meant by either. But it ſeemeth more probable, that the place of Iſai. 23. (according to Melanchon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab Eſai prædicta eſt, qui capite viceſſimo tertio inquit, venturos eſſe everſores Tyri ex terra Cittim; This Calamity (ſaith Melanchon) was foreſhewed by Eſai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the deſtroyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Iſrael eſteemed all men Iſlanders, which came to them by Sea, and ſeparate from the Continent (and ſo alſo Cittim might be taken for Italy, ſaith Beroaldus) yet we muſt take the firſt performance of the former Prophecie which took effect by the deſtruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who, after ſeven Moneths ſiege entred that proud City, and cut in pieces ſeven thouſand principal Citizens; ſtrangled two thouſand, and changed the freedom of 13 thouſand others into bondage and ſlavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appear plainly in the firſt of the Macchabees in theſe words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the Son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and ſlew Darius King of the Perſians, and Medes. Joſephus ſets Cethim in the Iſle of Cyprus, in which (ſaith he) there remaineth the City Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philoſopher (witneſs Laertius;) which City Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it ſtood in S. Hieroms time. So it may be that all the Iſlands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Iſlands of Cethim; and in that ſence might Cyprus be ſo called alſo; and yet, becauſe Tharſis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over againſt it, it is alſo very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharſis: and finding that Iſland too ſtraight for his people, after they were increaſed, and that the reſt of the Coaſts, both in Aſia and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and brothers, he ſent Colonies over the Ægean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodonim the fourth Son of Javan, and the youngeſt brother (by the moſt opinions) ſate down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharſis, and Eliſa, as he could. For Dodonim and Rhodanim are uſed indifferently by many Tranſlators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are ſo alike, as the one may eaſily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is alſo found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Moloſſia. And as Cethim, when he wanted ſoil in Cyprus: ſo Dodonim (ſeated in a farr leſs Iſland) did of neceſſity ſend his people farther off; and keeping alongſt the Coaſt, and finding Peloponneſus in the poſſeſſion of Eliſa, he paſſed a little further on the Weſtward, and planted in Epyrus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built (or perchance not ſo antient as Dodonim himſelf) yet his poſterity might give it that name in the memory of their firſt Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themſelves, but by their ſucceſſors many years after: every of their Families being deſirous to retain among them, by thoſe memories, out of what branch themſelves were taken and grafted elſe-where. And becauſe great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greateſt Cities often fired and demoliſhed, therefore thoſe that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Anceſtors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freeſt from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan ſettle himſelf and his children in the edge and frontier of Aſia the leſs, towards the Sea-ſhore: and afterward in Greece, and the Iſlands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the leſſer Aſia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Iubal, Meſech, and the reſt, round about him. And in like ſort did Chuſh (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the Weſt and South-weſt; and the Sons of Chuſh (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it ſelf) travelled Southward in Arabia fœlix, and South-weſt-ward into Arabia Petræa: the reſt of his children holding the Regions adjoyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chuſh in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Paleſtina adjoyning. The Sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all thoſe Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to thoſe of the Sons of Shem, which ſpread themſelves towards the Weſt, and the bordes of the Mediterrane Sea: of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. But firſt of the Sons of Cham or Ham; which were four:

Chuſh, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

SECT.

SECT. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scriptures, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

§. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopeses, Wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, vers. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great City in Thebaidai, called Cheramis (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now, though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senceless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desart, which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth the Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. vers. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nebuchodonosor's Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Numb. 12. vers. 1. as also else-where, understand Chush for Æthiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grosly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus, presuming that Chush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Numb. 12. vers. 1. is called a Woman of Chush) was a Woman of the Land of Æthiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Æthiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Countrey, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lieth thus in Josephus. And after he hath described the strength of the Æthiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length, Chambyses, called so from the name of his Sister (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses residere exercitum otiosum ægrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopium Regi filia nomine Tharbis, &c. Which Tale hath this sence in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to handy-stroakes, there happened this accident in the mean while: The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admiring his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only upheld and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereupon she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

§. II.

A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia it self to have been the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabæans are Arabians, and not Æthiopians; except Josephus can perswade us, that the Queen of Saba, which came from the South to hear the Wisdom of Solomon, were a Negroe, or Black-moor. And though Damianus à Goes speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John, of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perswade the Portugals, that he was descended of the Queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba and Solomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as also given aid and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing against our Opinion of Moses his Wife, to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the Daughter of Jethro, Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North-coast of the Red-Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and near Esion-Gaber, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red-Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Idumæa joyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North; to Arabia Petræa, by the East; to the Mediterrane, by the West; and to the Red-Sea, by the South-East. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived fourty years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses Vers. 15.

fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter, it is as plain as words can expreſs, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moſes kept the Sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Prieſt of Madian, and drave the Flock to the Deſart, and came to the Mountain of God in Horeb. Now, that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we believe Moſes himſelf, then was not the Wife of Moſes purchaſed in that manner which Joſephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and friends) neither had ſhe the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was ſhe a Negroe, but a Madianiteſs. And as God worketh the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt means: ſo it pleaſed him from a Shepherd to call Moſes, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People firſt and laſt. For Moſes ſitting by a Well (as diſconſolate, and a ſtranger) defended the Daughters of Reguel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occaſion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whoſe Daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Towns or Countries.

Exod. 2.

From hence alſo came Jethro to Moſes at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the inſupportable government of ſuch a multitude, he adviſed him to diſtribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Jethro had been an Æthiopian, it had been a farr progreſs for him to have paſſed throughout all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moſes, and to have found Moſes in the border of Idumæa: the Ægyptians hating Moſes, and all that favoured him. But the paſſing of Moſes through Arabia Petræa (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moſes was well acquainted in thoſe parts, in which the ſecond time he wandred fourty years, and did by theſe late travels of his, ſeek to inſtruct the Children of Iſrael in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and reſt. For he found them nouriſhed up with the milk of Idolatry, and obſtinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that thoſe ſtiff plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perſwaſion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deſarts, as God directed, and graſted their branches anew, that from thoſe he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own deſire, and Gods Commandments.

Sixt. Senenſ. Bibl.

Laſtly, this Opinion of Joſephus is condemned by Auguſtinus Chryſamenſis, where alſo he reprehended Apollinaris, who avowed that Moſes had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His own words have this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuiſſe Moſen, &c. Apollinaris alſo lyeth, in affirming that Moſes had two Wives: and who doth not perceive theſe things feigned by them; for it is manifeſt, that the Wife of Moſes was Zephora, Daughter to the Prieſt or Preſident of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Egypt; being the ſame that joyneth to Arabia: So farr Chryſamenſis.

¶. III.

Chuſh ill expounded for Æthiopia, Ezechiel 29. 10.

NOW, as Chuſh is by the Septuagint converted Æthiopia, and the Wife of Moſes therefore called Æthiopiſſa; ſo in the conqueſt of Nebuchodonoſor is Æthiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifeſt that Nebuchedonoſor was never in Æthiopia. Behold (ſaith Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the perſon of this great Aſſyrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waſte and deſolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the Black-Moors: which laſt words ſhould have been thus converted: From the Tower Seveneh, to the borders of the Chuſites, or Arabians, between which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seveneh to the Æthiopians, hath no ſence at all, Seveneh it ſelf being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the Black-moors. So as if Nebuchodonoſors conqueſt had been but between Seveneh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſs no other victory than the conqueſt of all that Land and Countrey, lying between Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyn together; or all the North parts of England between Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſence with the former, if any man ſought to expreſs by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, ſeated in Thebaida, which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nebuchodonoſor never entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Æthiopia for Chuſh.

Exech. 29. 10.

¶. IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, Chap. 30. Verſ. 9. in the like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezechiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort converted, In die illa egredientur nuncii à facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in Engliſh by the Geneveans: In that day ſhall their meſſengers go forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſs Moors afraid. Now, the Latine for (ſhips) hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three banks, and not ſhips. But that in this place the Tranſlation ſhould have been (as in the former) amended by uſing the word Chuſh, or Arabia, for Ethiopia, or the Black-Moors, every man may ſee which meanly underſtandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to paſs out of Egypt into Æthiopia, there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to paſs out of Northampton into Leiceſter-ſhire: Æthiopia being the conterminate Region with Egypt, and not divided ſo much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nebuchodonoſor ſhould ſend Gallies alongſt the Coaſt of the Red-Sea, by which an Army might be tranſported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (ſparing the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Deſart of Pharan) which Army might thereby ſurpriſe them unawares in their ſecurity and confidence. For when Nebuchodonoſor was at Seveneh within a mile of Æthiopia, he needed neither Gally nor Ship to paſs into it; being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, than one In-land ſhire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleaſure, he could not have done it; for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and ſteepy Mountains) called Cataduꝑæ Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, I have already observed, the Sons of every Father seated themselves as near together as possibly they could; Gomer and his Sons in Asia the less; Javan and his Sons in Greece, and the Islands adjoyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the sons and grand-children of Chush from the River of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguate unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had never acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Æthiopian Black-moors, as is remembred in the Chapter of Paradise.

§. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chush for Æthiopia.

AND as in these places before remembred, so in divers others is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia, or Chush, which puts the Story (where it is so understood) quite out of square; one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what sence hath this part of Scripture, Isai. 18. Væ terræ Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopiæ; or, according to the Septuagint, in these words: Væ terræ navium alarum quæ est trans fluvios Æthiopiæ; Wo to the Land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by Sea, even the Vessels of Reeds upon the waters. Væ terræ umbrosæ oræ; Wo to the Land of the shady coast, saith Junius. The former Translators understand it in this sence; That the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significatively called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this Message to the Israelites, which Isaiah repeateth, and by the former Translation, every man may see the transposition of Kingdoms: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next unto Judæa; when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated under the Equinoctial Line. And of this, Beroaldus asketh a material question (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now, if Æthiopia it self be under the Equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledg of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona Esperanza.

§. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are unadvisedly made Æthiopians.

AND by this Translation is the Story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judæa: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhaca (which all the Interpreters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatning Messengers to Ezechia King of Juda, perswading him to submit himself: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Ashur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabshekeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judæa and Benjamin, with a third Army (which himself commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus calls Tharsices) Rabshakeh hasted from the siege of Hieruiasem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthoropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelusium, and feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Hierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Army which was a foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desart: Now, the Desart which lay indifferent between Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part; the Desart, and the Happy; and by no otherway indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desart between Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, Vers. 9. hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sence have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. Whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius: Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Cushi; He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Cushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very smoak of Juda flaming was blown, being their neerest Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors under the Equinoctial, whom neither War nor Peace (which discovereth covereth all Regions) ever found out, saith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asia King of Juda, with an Army of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army, and those Chariots should pass through all Egypt (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how far distant, judge. For Princes do not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever such strength of Black-moors heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians such Travellers or Conquerours; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chush being first so converted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdoms, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

A farther Exposition of the place, Esai. 18. 1.

COncerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esay, Navium alarum, Winged Ships (so the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) sails whistling in the winds, or terræ umbrosæ oræ (after Junius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and St. Hierom, have one sence in effect. For the sails are commonly called the wings of a Ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our Ships sails slowly, that she wanteth wings (that is) when her sails are either worn, or too narrow: and we also use the same phrase of the wind whistling in the sails. And it may be that the Egyptians imployed so many of those small ships, as their sails were said to give a shadow over the Red-Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Isaiah) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signifie both to shadow, and to gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, under the shadow of thy wings; which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the argument of the 18th. Chapter of Isaiah: and this phrase is often elsewhere used, as in the 16. Psalm: Sab umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the shadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reed spoken of are of two kinds: either of basket-Willow covered with hides (as antiently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built up on both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

SECT. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

§. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt: and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

THE second son of Ham, was Mizraim; who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chush first possest Chaldæa on the West side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red-Sea, and to the South-east side of Judæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these four brothers possest all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldæa, as far to the West as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilæ, Samaria, and Judæa; with the two Egypts, whereof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopians, or Black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the rest of Noah's children sort themselves.

§. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunary years, which made their Antiquities seem more fabulous.

THis flourishing Kingdom possest by Mizraim, changed her antient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Ramesses, as some think) the son of Belus, thence his elder brother Davanus, shifting him into that part of Greece, now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai, abondoning their proper names: which happened 877. years after the Floud, in the time of Josua, as Saint Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojane Warr. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first Book against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name, 330. years after Josua, and about 1000. years after the Floud. But where Josephus in the same Book taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth Pastores, or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. years: whom also he calleth his Ancestors (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews) in this I am sure he was grosly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon faineth, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000. years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, cadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

Ante Jovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur
Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the Earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000. years, it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100 years, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary years to have been of the first kind of 27. days and eight hours; or otherwise 29. days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary years.

§. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator, in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Floud: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Floud: which Eusebius maketh 292. years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastia (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Salitis, to have been in the year of the World 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16, Dynastia was begun but in the 292. year after the Floud, as they account, and continued 190. years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastia to endure 115. years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100. years: for the 28. had but six years, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. years.

Now, Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. years: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. year after the Floud: so as where Mercator maketh all the 15. to precede the Floud, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the Floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of Falshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. year that Nimrod, with the Sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth year of Nimrods reign (which was ten years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt possest, and a Government established in the very first year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any Expedition farr off, or near, in question: for, from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

§. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. years after the Creation, at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Floud.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled with 100. or 200. years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Floud, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeò multiplicari potuit, ut ad Ægyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred years of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pereius) we must also confess, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now, seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving-belief, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cavelling humors: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate resolvedness, to maintain factions needless, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this Opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a less increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Floud double, and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who being fearfull that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the land of Nod, and there, by the help of his own issues, built a City (called Enoch) after the name of his first-born. Now, if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. years by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancie of the first Age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years the same (if not a greater) number might be increased increaſed; and ſo within 70. years after (that is, by ſuch time as the World had ſtood 200. years) Aſſyria, Syria, and Egypt might be poſſeſt before the Floud, as they were within the ſame or leſs time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumſtance or true Story of the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Empire, that all thoſe people, which were increaſed in the firſt 100. or 130. years after the Floud, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For, that ever Noah himſelf came out of the Eaſt, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, ſo all probable conjecture and reaſon it ſelf denies it. Again, thoſe multitudes and powerfull numbers which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, conſidered with her own Army of three millions (and the reſt not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had ſuch plenty of people in ſo few years after the Floud, it might alſo be as plentifully filled in like time before it: For after their own account, Ninus governed Babylonia and Aſſyria but 292. years after the Floud of Noah. And theſe Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all thoſe Eaſtern Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterrane Sea; when there had now paſt from the Floud to the time of this her invaſion ſomewhat leſs or more than 300. years: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confeſs, that in reſpect of the ſtrange greatneſs of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as ſhort a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is ſaid, That her Army conſiſted of 1300000. Foot-men, and 500000. Horſe-men, it muſt needs be, that long before Semiramis Reign, the greateſt part of Aſia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it ſelf (much part whereof is barren) muſt long before this time of Semiramis, have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himſelf Maſter of all Nations, entred (notwithſtanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or ſought his aſſiſtance. And if Arabia were then ſo well repleniſhed, I ſee no cauſe but Egypt might alſo be peopled. Now, if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Juſtine) Egypt was a moſt flouriſhing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For theſe be his own words, ſpeaking of Ninus: Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conqueſts of Ninus witneſs, who ſubdued with no ſmall force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Bactrians; yea all that whole Body of Aſia on this ſide India. For Diodorus out of Cteſias numbreth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaſter, at 1700000 Foot-men, and 200000 Horſmen: and the Stories generally ſhew, that though Zoroaſter's Army was far ſhort of this, yet it was greater than any that thoſe parts of the World ever ſince beheld. But to what end ſhould I ſeek for forreign Authority? for no man doubteth, but that Egypt was poſſeſt by Mizraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an eſtabliſhed Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abrahams's time, the Scriptures tells us. And ſure, to prepare and cultive a deſolate and over-grown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Laws and Policies, cannot be eſteemed a labour of a few days: and therefore it muſt be inhabited in a leſs time than 200 years after the Floud; and in the ſame time (if not in a ſhorter) before the Flood. For if ſo many millions of men were found within 300 years after the general Flood; ſo as not only Babylon and Aſſyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Paleſtina, yea, the far-off Lybia on the one ſide, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what corners could then all thoſe Nations be compreſt, which 1656 years brought forth before the Flood? even neceſſity, which cannot be reſiſted, caſt the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known World; eſpecially, where death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had beheld living Nations of his own body.

§. V.

Of ſome other Reaſons againſt the Opinion of Peterius.

FOr what a ſtrange increaſe did the long lives of the firſt Age make, when they continued 800 or 900 years? Surely we have reaſon to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than they were not ſpred over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World; wherein if one exceed fifty years, ten for one are cut off in that paſſage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude ſuch, as if by Wars, or Peſtilence they were not ſometimes taken off by many thouſands, the Earth, with all the induſtry of man, could not give them food. What ſtrange heaps then of Souls had the firſt Ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900 years as aforeſaid? Theſe numbers, I ſay, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the ſame reckoning in effect, as if all thoſe which have been born in Britain ſince three or four hundred years before the Norman Conqueſt (ſaving ſuch as by accident, or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to theſe there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increaſed. For (to omit, that the Giants and Mighty Ones of the firſt Age obſerved no Law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that thoſe Lovers of the World and Pleaſure, when they knew the long and liberal Time which Nature had given them, would not willingly or haſtily preſent themſelves to any danger, which they could fly from, or eſchew. For what humane Argument hath better perſwaſion to make men careleſs of life, and fearleſs of death, than the little time which keeps them aſunder, and that ſhort time alſo accompanied with ſo many pains and diſeaſes, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and ſoweth with the ſeeds of Mankind?

Now, if that Beroſus or Annius may be alledged for ſufficient Authors, whom Pererius himſelf in this Queſtion citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Joſephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was ſeated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I ſee no cauſe why Paleſtina (which is alſo a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left deſolate both all the life-time of Cain, and all thoſe times between his death and the Flood, which were by eſtimation ſeven or eight hundred years. And ſure, though this fragment of Beroſus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or loſt) yet all things in Beroſus are not to be rejected. Therefore St. Hierome, for ſuch Au-

Authors gives a good Rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us chuse what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly, in the very beginning of the first Book, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the General Flood: and in that first Part Berosus affirmeth, that those Mighty Men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, Commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universal World: and though that Phrase (Of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there dwelling at Hierusalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Berosus, it is plain, that his words and sence were the same: for he addeth, From the Suns rising to the Suns setting; which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more passable and easie to travel over before the Flood than after it. For Pererius himself confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200 years after Ogyges Flood; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into far Countries after the General Deluge, when the Earth lay (as it were) incopsed for an hundred or an hundred and thirty years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and less cumbersome to walk over, in the first Age, than after the General Overflowing.

VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. Vers. ult. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LAstly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the Tenth of Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of Tongues was the cause of the disperlion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: The Text it self rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Flood: inferring, that before the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sence may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Flood, or to any plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noahs Sons, wherein doth that necessary division controul the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther off and general plantation: as Berosus says well, that when man-kind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we find (as it is before said) that within 300. years after the Floud, there were gathered together into two Armies such multitudes, as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers, with their increase for any long time; all Asia, the Greater and the Lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palæstina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania, and Lybia, being also that time fully peopled. And if we believe Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World but (within 140. years after the Floud) Spain, Italy, and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the Floud, in the time of the chief strength of mankind, they were repleniſhed with people. And certainly, seeing all the World was overflown, there were people in all the World which offended.

||. VII.

A Conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Son of Ham*) which peopled* Lybia.

THerefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I do not think the report of their Antiquites so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the Floud, and 200. or 300. years more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of Stone or Metal) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Floud, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldæans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters, and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634. years before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. years before the Floud, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt: It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus, the Son of Belus, as aforesaid, being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis, or Nicopolis, to the Mediterrane Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of the Greek Letter Delta, which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east, and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed. The other branch, which yielded it self to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Æthiopia, and had the the name of Thebaida, of the ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks, Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Josephus calls Egypt, Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Joſ. l. 1. Ant. l. 1. Hero. Euterpe.

Phut, the third Son of Ham, took the next portion of Land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutei (saith Josephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush, and Lud were conterminii, and associates with the Egyptians.

SECT. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sons.

Canaan (the fourth Son of Ham) possest all that Region, called by the Romans Palæstina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Judæa; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy-Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set down by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Adma, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha. Now, howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was, that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrah the East, and the other Cities named, stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan South-ward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now, the Sons of Canaan which possest this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth, or Chethæus.
3. Jebusi, or Jebusæus.
4. Emori, or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeshi, or Girgiseus.
6. Hevi, or Chiveus.
7. Arki, or Harkeus.
8. Seni, or Sinæus.
9. Arvadi, or Arvadæus.
10. Zemari, or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamathæus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari, or Samarius, or from some of his.

¶. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first-born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nepthali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth, or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus juramenti) four miles from Gaza, dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite, did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying; That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

¶. III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebusæus, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Countrey near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus, in the edge of Cœlosyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Juda, and in Idumea, near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometimes called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite, before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

¶. IV.

‖. IV.

Of the Gergeſites, Hevites and Harkites.

THe fifth Son of Canaan was Gergeſius, or Gergeſion (otherwiſe Girgaſi) who inhabited on the Eaſt-ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy ſets the City Geraſa, which Joſephus calls Geſera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Chriſt diſpoſſeſſed the poſſeſſed with devils; and the Gergeſites deſired him to depart their Coaſts, becauſe their Swine, filled with the evil Spirits, drowned themſelves in the Sea of Galilee: Gergeſeus alſo built Beritus (ſometime Geris) afterward Fœlix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romans held a Garriſon: and to which Auguſtus gave many large priviledges.

Heveus the ſixth Son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. Theſe Hevites, howſoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the ſecond is remembred) yet many of them remained all the Warr of Joſua, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleaſed utterly to root out theſe Nations, but they were ſometimes made Tributaries to the Iſraelites, and at other times ſerved (in their falling away from the true worſhip of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to prove Iſrael by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The ſeventh Son was Araceus, or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterrane Sea (over againſt Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

‖. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sineus the eighth Son, Hieroſolymitanus ſets at Caparorſa, which Ptolemy finds in Judæa, not farr from Jebus; to the South thereof, ſaith Junius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which Saint Hierome calls Sim: Ptolemy, Simyra: Mela, and Pliny, Symirus: Brochard, Sycon (called Synochis) near Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Deſarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all theſe places, affirming, that Sineus built Sinochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is alſo another Nation of Cini, written with the letter C. (otherwiſe Kenæi) who deſcended of Hobab the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their conduction through the wilderneſs of Pharan. But the Cinæi were admitted among the Iſraelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beſide their habitations with the Amalekites: againſt theſe Cinai, Balaam propheſied, that they ſhould be deſtroyed by the Aſſyrians.

Jud. 4. Jeſ. 19.33.

Gul. Tyr. Vit.

The ninth Son was Aradeus, or Arvadeus, who in the Iſle of Aradus, built the City Arados: oppoſite againſt which Iſland, on the Main of Phœnicia, they founded another City of that name, which for oppoſition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came Saint Peter (ſaith Clement) and in this Iſle preached the Goſpel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no ſuch work of his in the Acts of the Apoſtles. Both theſe two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his Prophecies againſt the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners. Cap. 27. v. 8.

‖. VI

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers Opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœloſyria at Edeſſa, and founded Samaraim, which in Joſua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is alſo Samarajim (of the ſame Orthography) upon the Mountain of Ephraim (ſaith Beroaldus) mentioned in the ſecond of Chron. c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amiſs (ſaith he) by Semeron. The Hieroſolymitan Paraphraſt makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the Parent of the Emiſſani, which Pliny calls the Hemiſſeni, in Cœloſyria; and it may be that it was their firſt habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited thoſe other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the firſt of Kings (ſpeaking of Omri) diſproveth; And he bought the Mountain Samaria, or Shemeron of one Shemar, for two Talents of Silver, and built in the Mountain; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemar, Lord of the Mountain, Samaria. But of all theſe places Iſhall ſpeak more at large in the Conqueſt of the Holy Land, by the children of Iſrael. Of whomſoever the Samaritans were deſcended, ſure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and baſe: for as long as the ſtate of the Jews ſtood up, they always called themſelves Jews: when it ſuffered, or ſank, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at ſuch time as they were returned from their firſt captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Aſſyrians, and partly of the Naturals.

Of Hamathi.

THe laſt of Canaans Sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath (ſaith Beroaldus:) of which (the aſpiration taken away) the ſame is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was preſent. Joſephus, and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which ſtandeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountain Caſſius, and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which Saint Peter was Biſhop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were born; but Antioch, firnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus ſuppoſeth, which ſtandeth between Apamea and Emeſa in Caſſiotis. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which Neighboureth Emeſa, are farther off ſeated from Canaan, than ever any of thoſe Nations ſtraggled. And whereas St. Hierom ſetteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifeſt, that Epiphania, which ſtandeth to the North of Emeſa, hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land

Land divided. And if Libanon it self were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces, Laodicea, and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken, could not be a part of Nepthali, as in the thirteenth of Josua is directly proved. For Josua counting the Lands that remained unpossest, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sun-rising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: Because David accepted the Presents of Tohu King of Emath, and
1 Sam. 8. 9 (therewithal) conditions of Peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight: For if the Promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though
Cap. 11. v. 24. seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Josua: for Emath is indeed situated on the other side of the Mountain of Hermon, which joyneth to Libanus; and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Josua 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierom mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephtalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Ammath, and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephtalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Assedim: which City S. Hierom writes Emath; Josephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people of Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabsakeh vaunteth in the Cap. 18. & 19. second of Kings; Where is the God of Hamath?

SECT. XIII.

Of the Sons of Chush (excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.)

The Sons of Chush, were, { Sheba, Havila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the Sons of Raama, were, { Sheba, and Dedan. }

¶. I.

That most of the Sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Solomon.

SEba or Saba was the eldest Son of Chush, the eldest Son of Ham; to make a difference between him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus) his Name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the Son of Regma with an (S) asperat, which is the Hebrew, Schin. Seba the eldest Son of Chush, Regma his Brother, and Sheba the Son of Regma possess'd both the shores of Arabia Fœlix. Saba took that part towards the Red-Sea, as neareſt his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East-coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulf of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabæi, Arabum populi, propter thura clarissimi, ad utraque maria porrectis gentibus habitant: The Sabæans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red-Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia, à populo mixtione, saith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red-Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian; with whom also we may leave Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, because he remembreth a Nation (called Stabæi) near the Persian Sea; and Massabathæ which descended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama, into Caramania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabæi which stole away Job's Cattle, should run through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petræa, and find out Job in Traconitis, between Palæstina and Cœlosyria, 1200 miles off. Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I think, that neither the Sabæi on the Red-Sea, nor those towards the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth upon Job, which soever Beroaldus shall take for neareſt. But these were the Sabæi of Arabia the Desart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth, out of his own experience, that the City Saba is seated: the same which Ptolemy calls Save, now Semiscasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desart, came those Magi or Wise-men, which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostom, Hierom, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise-men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desart: which City, when my self was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiscasac. And to approve this Opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabæi were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red-Sea) are so disjoyned with large Deserts, as there is no possibility for strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of Cattle, both in respect of the Mountains, of the Sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Ubi nec homines, nec bestiæ videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperrimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, nor birds, no, not so much as trees, or any pasture or grass, but only sharp, and high, stony, and craggy Mountains. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive, that the Queen of Saba, which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabæi, on the East-side of Arabia fœlix; but the contrary seems more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, betwixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as far down as Midian, or Madian, and Ezion Gaber; and this Queen of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might, without any far travel, enter his Territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But, to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Seba, or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sons, Sheba and Dedon, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Desart: only Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East-side of Chush, who held Arabia Petræa. Now, for Sabta, there is found of his Name, the City of Sbbatha, or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Pliny and Ptolemy; who withal nameth Sabotale, within the Walls whereof there was sometimes found sixty Temples. Ezechiel joyneth the Father and the Son together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians, their Merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Astabari; they be not worthy any farther Answer than hath already been given: especially seeing these Cities preserving the memory of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, though in some Letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoyning, the names of other of the Brethren of the Family of Chush, with little alterations, are preserved. In Arabia the Desart, is found the City of Sabæ, or Sare (now Semiscasac) with the City of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolemy himself called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happy, is found the City of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keepeth the sound of Rhegma, the City of Saptha, or Saptah, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and Chief City in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea, the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoyning, Sabæi; and to the South thereof again toward the streight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his Brothers and Nephews which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tygris was a neighbour, to whom he might pass by Boat, even unto Rhegma the City of Raama, or Rhegma, set near the River of Lar to wards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolemy's time.

Ezech. 27. v.22.

Rice, but nothing at all of any Manufacture: and all these they exchanged for Linnen, or Iron chiefly.

But in those days, the West part of Africa, within the body of the Land, was known only by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore, that the Negroes of the West Æthiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either pass by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the Mediterrane Sea, were a strange or rather a foolish fancy. Now, to put it out of Dispute, that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the Children of Chush, which Seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet; let us hear Hieremy his own words: Fly, ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Esau upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Province of Arabia Petræa; and Dedan, which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Fælix, joyned in that part to Petræa, the seat of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood of Dedan and the Idumæans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy man and beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword. Ezech. 15. v. 15.

¶. II.

Josephus his Opinion of Dedan, one of the Issue of Chush, to have been seated in the West Æthiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

And whereas Josephus (whom in this Saint Hierom followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the Son of Raamah into the West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, and Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15th Verse, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22th Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his Father and Brother) above four thousand miles. Besides which, the Merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-Moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious cloaths for thy Chariots; and these Western Æthiopians never saw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the Merchandise of their Countrey being Hides, Elephants Teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet-Cats, and

SECT. XIII.

Of the Issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Verse 7.

After Chush, it followeth to speak of Mizraim's Sons, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plural, to signifie the Nations which came of them. Ludim, the elder Son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoyning. Among the Sons of Shem, there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the Son of Mizraim, by the singular number: the Son of Shem being written Lud; the Son of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who joyned them in this sort together: Come up ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Lybians which bear the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joyned together; Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel, cap. 30. ver. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the Sons of Chush (which were the Chushites) the Sons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians descended of his Son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I believe it; because Hieremie joyneth the Libyans and Lidyans together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seem to be called Lubim, or Lubæi, a name somewhat near the word Lybies, and by which it may seem that the truer writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither ther is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirteenth of Ezechiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatning to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Egypt and Palæstina, which opinion I could not mislike, if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda, with a double d, and is the same City which was afterwards Diospolis, in which St. Peter cured Æneas of the Palsie) standeth near the Torrent Gaas, not far from Joppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder: For there are many Cities of one name, founded in all the Regions of the World, and far asunder; as after the name of Alexander, Teleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia: so of divers others. St. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third Son of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either Opinion may be true.

Chap. 46. v. 9.

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a sign of the plural number, as aim, of the dual.

The rest of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Casluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casluhim inhabited Cassiotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Cassius are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated near Casluhim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not far from Pelusium, Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Casluhim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange Kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) do not use the Letter (p) but instead of it (ph.) Their principal Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasæi, Ascalonitæ, Azotii, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ: Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim; and of that City the Country adjoyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first known King of the Philistims, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a Covenant and League. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written, that he was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the Common-wealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his Successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterrane Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cæsaria Palæstina, or Stratons Tower) which was the South border of Phœnicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Giants were of these Philistims: and Goliah was of Geth, one of the five Cities above-named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150 years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakned by Sampson and Samuel; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

Basil upon the 33. Psalm. Hierom upon the 29. of Ezechiel.

It is Objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoyning, were held by the Sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossess the Sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Josua, yet at the time of the Promise it was possessed by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Jeremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims, the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: And in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Have I not brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I read this place with divers of the Learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Palæstinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, between Ptolomais or Barce and Apollonia; but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene; and so hath the Geneva. But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar Translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Euxine in the North of Asia the Less. For which of these inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palestina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. for it is written in the second of the Kings, That Teglathphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir of Cyrene in Media, calling this Cerene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media; because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captivated.

Of the Issue of Sem.

‖. I.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe Posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Geneology and Story of the Hebrews: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five Sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the the Children of him and Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saving that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose Issues, and the Issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Ashur, Elam, and Lud (saving India) which I believe Noah himself first inhabited; and to whom Ophir and Havilah, the Sons of Joctan afterward repaired: Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asiæ usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These Sons of Sem (saith (St. Hierom) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Ios. Ant. l. 1. c. 7. Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred Acts 2. ver. 9. And the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings Seat of Persia (witness Daniel) And I saw (saith he) in a Vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ulai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Ashur (as most Historians believe) the second Son of Sem, was the Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that Opinion. Every man's hand hath been in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speak much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane Letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and Diod. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the most powerful Princes among them, had yet the Mountain Taurus for the utmost of his Dominion toward the North-East, and Syria bounded him towards the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden which were at Telassar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena, and Ivah? All these were indeed but petty Kings of Cities, and Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturea, under Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sephar, and others of this sort. Yea, Nebuchadonozor, who was most powerful before the Conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina, and Phœnicia, parts thereof. But in this Question of Assur, I will speak my Opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose Plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire; from whom the most memorable Story of the World taketh beginning

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldæans, saith Saint Hierom and Josephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: for the Sons of Cham possest the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrews; for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the less, is the common Opinion, taken from Josephus and Saint Hierom; but I see not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

¶. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

Aram the first and last Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Eusebius out of Josephus) which Syrus lived before Moses was born; the same which others call the Son of Apollo. Mesopotamia also, being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajim, which is as much to say, as, Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compassed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Mesopotamia simply.

Euseb. p. 10. c.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy Mothers Father, and thence take thee a Wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram, or Aramea, as these his own words converted witness: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant; Those which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Gen. 28. 2. see Gen. 25. 10. also Deut. 23. 4. Judg. 3. Paral. 1. 19. Psal. 59. Strab. lib.

Against this Opinion, that Aram the Son of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of those in Syria Inter-Amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some read, Genes. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the Original read Kemuel, the Son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note, the rather, because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Posterity could be famous) we find Mesopotamia called Aram, and that with an addition, sometimes with Naharajim, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seems) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks, in his Notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan-Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ancobaritis (so called from the River Chaboras, which, dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajim (which (latter appellation questionless comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this Opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region; because the two Rivers (as it were) yoaked together go along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities, in Ptolemy, called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

The

The Sons of Aram were, { Uz, or Hus. Hul. Gether, and Meſch, or Mes.

Uz, or Hus, inhabited about Damaſcus, and built that City, ſaith Joſephus, and Saint Hierom. But Toſtatus miſtaking this Opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who alſo followeth Joſephus, affirmeth, that Abraham's Steward, Eliezer, was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus, the eldeſt Son of Aram, dwelt neer unto his Father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the ſame, adjoining to Arabia the Deſart, and to Batanea, or Traconitis; whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Rejoyce and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwelleſt in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is ſeated beyond Jordan, in the Eaſt Region of Traconitis, adjoining to Baſan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountain Seir to the Eaſt, Edrai to the South, Damaſcus North, and Jordan Weſt: having in it many Cities and People, as may alſo be gathered out of Hieremy: And all ſorts of people, and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, deſcended of Hus, the Son of Nahor, the Brother of Abraham (ſaith S. Hierom) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, ſaith Philo.

Chap. 25. v. 20.

Hul, the ſecond Son of Aram, S. Hierom makes the Father of the Armenians; and Gether, the third Son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians: which Opinion (becauſe I find not where to ſet him) I do not diſprove, though I ſee no reaſon why Gether ſhould leave the fellowſhip of his own Brethren, and dwell among ſtrangers in Aſia the leſs. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Deſart of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy ſetteth the City of Cholle.

Gether (ſaith Joſephus) founded the Bactrians: but Joſephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all haſt. For mine own Opinion, I always keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Gether ſeated himſelf neer his Brothers in the Body of Syria, and in the Province of Caſſiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius alſo giveth to Mes, or Meſch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Meſopotamia, near the Mountain Maſius. The certainty of thoſe Plantations can no otherwiſe be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his Sons in the ſame Land about him: for he wanted no ſcope of Territory for himſelf and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reaſon to caſt them in the Deſart parts of the World, ſo far aſunder. And as neceſſity and policy held them together for a while; ſo ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, ſet them aſunder. For although theſe Sons of Aram, and the Sons of the reſt of Noah's children kept themſelves within the bounds of ſome one large Kingdom; yet therein every one alſo ſought a Province apart, and to themſelves; giving to the Cities, therein built, their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their Poſterity: the uſe of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this ſort did the pride of the Spaniards in America caſt them into ſo many Provinces: every one emulating and diſdaining the greatneſs of other, as they are thereby to this day ſubject to invaſion, expulſion, and deſtruction: ſo as (Nova Hiſpania and Peru excepted, becauſe thoſe Countreys are unacceſſible to ſtrangers) an eaſie force will caſt them out of all the reſt.

Mes, the fourth Son, is made the Parent of the Mœonians: of whom ſomething had been ſpoken already. Arphaxad, the third Son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two Sons, Phaleg and Joctan: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth divided. Chap. 8. Sect. 7.

‖. III.

Of the diviſion of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the iſſue of Sem.

THe inany People which at the diviſion (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the Eaſt part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (ſaith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm, that this partition hapned at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the year after the Floud 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it ſo many years after the Floud, ere the children of Noah ſevered themſelves. But to this Opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make, how in ſo few years as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) ſo many people could be increaſed, Pererius gives this Anſwer, That if 70. perſons of the Family of Jacob increaſed to 600000. fighting men in 215. years (beſides women, children and impotent perſons) how much more is it likely, that ſo ſoon after the Floud the children of Noah might, in a ſhorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the bleſſing of God, Increaſe and multiply, and fill the Earth; What ſtrength this Anſwer hath, let others judge: for the children of Iſrael were 70. and had 215. years time: and the Sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. years of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the diviſion, in memory thereof: as Joſephus and S. Auguſtine, who reaſon in this manner. If the diviſion were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was, by more likely computation, 12. years before his birth) then was the diviſion 38. years after Ninus, who governed 52. years: in the 43. year of whoſe Reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the Aſſyrians, 80. years before this diviſion (as this diviſion is placed by the Hebrews, Hierom and Chriſoſtom) then was the Earth ſo peopled in all the Eaſt & Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time ſince. For Ninus, aſſociating to himſelf Arieus King of Arabia, a People who at that time (ſaith Diodorus Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præſtabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, ſubdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and ſeven Children; vanquiſhed all thoſe Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Perſia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the number which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Cteſias) againſt Zoroaſter and others: and and Zoroaſter on the other ſide, who made reſiſtance with 400000 prove it ſufficiently, that if the diviſion had not hapned before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diviſion at that time at all. For ſome of them were ſo ill ſatisfied with their portions, as they ſought to be maſters of all; and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this Opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Per. in Gen. lib. 15. c. 10.

But for that conceit, that if the diviſion had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then ſufficient numbers born to fill the Earth: It was never meant that the Earth could be filled every where at the very inſtant, but by times and degrees. And ſurely, whatſoever mens Opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the diviſion of Tongues and of Men muſt go neer together with the ceaſing of the work of Babel: and that the enterpriſe of Babel was left off inſtantly upon the confuſion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diviſion; and ſo neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101. after the Floud, which was the year Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten years after he arrived, ſaith Beroſus.

Now, if it be objected, That Phaleg (the Etymologie of whoſe name ſignifieth Diviſion) muſt have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confuſion and partition: to this Objection, it may be anſwered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures; for Jacob was called Iſrael after he had wreſtled with the Angel; Abraham was firſt Abram; and Edom, Eſau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this diviſion, had his firſt name upon this accident changed, it is moſt probable.

And laſtly, whereas the Hebrews, Saint Hierom, and Chryſoſtom, account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name Phaleg, he foretold the diviſion which followed: to this I ſay, I do not find that Heber deſerved any ſuch honour, if he had thereupon ſo called his Son: for diviſion and diſperſion followeth increaſe of people of neceſſity; and this Prophecy (if any ſuch had been) might alſo have reference to the diviſion, which afterwards fell amongſt the Hebrews themſelves.

But if we give a reaſonable time to the Building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reaſon and by demonſtrative proof) might be increaſed: and that upon the fall thereof the confuſion and diviſion followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monſtrous.

‖. IV.

Of the ſons of Joctan, the other Son of Heber.

The Sons of Joctan were,
1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Aſamath, or Chatzar.
4. Jare, or Jaraah, or Jerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
13. Jobab.

ALl thoſe Sons of Joctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the Eaſt parts of the World, or India, even from the River Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of thoſe thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moſes being general: And their dwelling was from Meſha as thou goeſt unto Separ a Mount in the Eaſt. Gen. 10. 30. Of all theſe thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whoſe names, to avoid confuſion, it is to be obſerved, that among the Sons of Chuſh, two of them had alſo the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had alſo a third Seba, or Sheba, his Grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the Son of Chuſh, and Sheba the Son of Rhegma his Nephew we have left in Arabia fœlix; and Havilah the Son of Chuſh upon Tygris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as ſome have thought) the Father of the Sabæans in Perſia; of which Nations Dionyſius de Orbis ſitu maketh mention; Primum Sabæi; poſt hos ſunt Paſſagardæ; prope vero hos ſunt Taſci: The firſt are Sabæans; after theſe be Paſſægarde; and near theſe the Taſci. And whereas it is written; But unto the Sons of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and ſent them away from Iſaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eaſtward to the Eaſt-Country: Hereupon it is ſuppoſed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandered into Perſia: for Perſia was accounted the furthermoſt Eaſt-Country in reſpect of Judæa; which alſo Ovid ſetteth under the Sun-riſing. Gen. 25. 6. Yet ſeeing the reſt of Abraham's Sons ſeated themſelves on the borders of Judæa, I rather chooſe to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia the Deſart, where Ptolemy ſetteth a City of that name. Metam. l. 1.

But Saba, the Son of Joctan, the Son of Heber (as I conceive) inhabited India it ſelf. For Dionyſius Afer in his Periegeſis (or deſcription of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verſe, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis hos inter medios habitatque Sabæus; In the middeſt of theſe dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, ſaith Dionyſius. τῶν δὲ μέσοι ναίουσι Σαβαῖ καὶ Ταξίλοι ἀνδρες.

§. V.

Of Ophir one of Joctan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

Ophir also was an inhabitant of the East India, and (as St. Hierom understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with Gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccæ. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsulæ: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus, out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and 6th Verse, gathers, that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words, in the second of the Chronicles, are these: And he over-layed the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene, a Province of Susiana, called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the inriching of the Temple.

Gen. 2. 11. & 12. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this Question may be a subject of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least, America hath none, no not any City, Village or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pisarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards, utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the Diurnal of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama, had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Jesuite in his natural and moral History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Joctan, who as he supposeth navigated from the utmost East of India or America: it is most true, that Jucatan is nothing else in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Jucatan (which is) What ask you, or What say you? The like happened touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidado, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountains. For at Paria begin that marvellous ledg of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The same happened among the English, which I sent under Sir Richard Greenevile to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Slaves answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You wear good cloaths, or gay cloaths. The same happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that self place which the Sea encompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner have many places, newly discovered, been entituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now, although there may be found Gold in Arabia it self (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain Islands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Solomons Ships made from the Red-Sea (which was three years in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed these that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two years, and sometimes less: and Solomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the compass was known, it was impossible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Solomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the East India Islands, farr above the Mines of any one place of America) to sail every year to the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they built a City called Manilia. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those days, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantastical Opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whose Mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountains Solinus affirmed to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words: Nam cum Auro & Gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent universa, alites ferocissimæ, Arimaspi cum his dimicant &c. For whereas these Countreys abound in Gold and rich Stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kind of Fowl, the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people, called Arimaspi, make Warr. These Arimaspi are said to have been men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclops of Sicilia: of which Cyclops, Herodotus, and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Book: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus, in the Story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own Opinion) I believe none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first given them, by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eyes; and and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gisolitron, or the Cave of the North-east wind. For the rest, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon some true Stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for Gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect sences, and were not deprived of half their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this Fable be feigned in this place, yet, if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains, which are very rich, and full of Gold, inhabited onely with Tygers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beasts: unto which, if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same warr which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the Gold, or seek to defend that metal, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow inraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said, that the Alegartos (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the In-land: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the Pearl, yet they find savour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they devour.

¶. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who also passed into the East-Indies: and of Mesha and Sepher named in the bordering of the families of Joctan: with a Conclusion of this Discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general Opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East-India, in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East-India, which took name of Havilah the Son of Joctan: but Havilah which Pison compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the Son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But, that Saul ever made warr in the East-India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joctan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Ophir; though at the first seated by their Brethren about the Hill Masius, or Mesh, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) between Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet, at length, either themselves, or their issues removed into the East-India, leaving the other Families of Joctan, to fill the Countreys of their first plantations, which the Scripture defines to have been from Mesh unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesh to be a Region of the East-India, and Sephar a Mountain of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For, the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judæa, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Mesech is that part of the Mountain of Masius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaborus springeth, which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also find for Sephar (remembred by Moses) Sipphara by Ptolemy, standing to the East of the Mountain Masius; from whence, Joctan having many Sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

1 Sam. 15. 2. 7.

The other fashion of Planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia (witness this place of Deuteronomy: Because they hired Balaam the Son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluviorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid. Ver. 7.

This plantation of the World after the Floud doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these later Times) have, by their many Volumes of untrue reports, left Honour without a Monument, and Virtue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and dissolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first Planters after the Floud (I mean the greatest number, and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out, nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest Son of Canaan gave name; so hath Cilicia, Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hibernian, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signs of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP.

Chap. IX.

Of the Beginning and Eſtabliſhment of Government.

SECT. I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt Government under the eldeſt of the families to be Regal, and from Regal abſolute, to Regal tempered with Laws.

IT followeth now, to intreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had ſcarcity of people) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Elderſhip. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldeſt of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes uſed, both for the Magiſtrate, and for thoſe of Age and gravity: the ſame bearing one ſignification almoſt in all Languages. For, in the Eleventh of Numbers, God commanded Moſes to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Governours over them: the Hebrew bearing the ſame ſence which the Latine word Senes, or Seniores doth. So it is written in Suſanna, Then the Aſſembly believed them as thoſe that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And ſo in the words of thoſe falſe Judges and Witneſſes to Daniel, Shew it unto us, ſeeing God hath given thee the Office of an Elder. Demoſthenes uſeth the ſame word for the Magiſtrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reaſons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui ampliſſimum Magiſtratum gerunt, ut ſunt, ſic etiam appellantur, Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians, the chief Magiſtrates, as they were, ſo they are called, Eldermen: And again, Ratio & prudentia niſi eſſent in ſenibus, non ſummum Concilium Majores noſtri appellâſſent Senatum; If reaſon and adviſement were not in old men, our Anceſtours had never called the higheſt Councel by the name of Senate.

But, though theſe reaſons may well be given, yet we doubt not, but in this name of (Elders) for Governours, or Counſellours of State, there is a ſign that the firſt Governours were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldeſt Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard, take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordſhip and Dominion: ſignifying (according to Loyſeau) puiſſance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: The one, Poteſtas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or maſter-ſhip: The correlative of the one is the Subject; of the other, the Slave. Ad Cæſarem (ſaith he) poteſtas omnium pertinet; ad ſingulos proprietas; Cæſar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his own: And again, Cæſar omnia imperio poſſidet, ſinguli dominio; Cæſar holdeth all in his power, and every man poſſeſſeth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increaſe: ſo obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent ſeed ſeldome ripeneth) being exceedingly overſhadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the ſoft weapons of Paternal perſwaſions (after man-kind began to neglect and forget the Original and firſt giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to reſiſt the firſt inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to conſtrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and ſteered by their own fancies, and toſt to and fro on the tempeſtuous Seas of the World, while Wiſdom was ſevered from power and ſtrength from charity: Neceſſity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wiſe and fooliſh underſtand at once, that the eſtate of reaſonable men would become far more miſerable than that of beaſts, and that a general floud of confuſion would a ſecond time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to Order and Dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who truſted in their own ſtrengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themſelves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. Inſomuch, that the licentious diſorder (which ſeemed to promiſe a liberty upon the firſt acquaintance) proved, upon a better trial, no leſs perillous than indurable bondage.

Neceſſitas eſt firmum judicium, & immutabilis providentiæ poteſtas.

Theſe Arguments, by Neceſſity propounded, and by Reaſon maintained and confirmed, perſwaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to ſubject themſelves to a Maſter, and to Magiſtracy in ſome degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it leſs evil, than the former miſchiefs) was generally pleaſing: ſo time (making all men wiſe that obſerve it) found ſome imperfection and corroſive in this cure. And therefore the ſame Neceſſity which invented, and the ſame Reaſon which approved, Sovereign power; bethought it ſelf of certain equal rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundleſs) might alſo diſcern her own limits. For before the invention of Laws, private affections in ſupream Rulers made their own fancies both their Treaſurers and Hangmen; meaſuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Ballance, both good and evil.

For as wiſedom in Elderſhip preceded the rule of Kings; ſo the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other laws than the wills of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did thoſe men's Virtues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor thoſe men's Vices deform them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love ſees one while too much, another while ſtark nothing. Hence it came to paſſe, that after a few years (for direction and reſtraint of Royal power) Laws were eſtabliſhed : and that Government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even Ballance ſupreme power and common right) acquired the Title of Regal : the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical : the one, God eſtabliſhed in favour of his people ; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regal Authority, Princes as they were choſen for their Virtues only, ſo did they meaſure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (ſaith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia juſti erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dicti ; Princes becauſe they were juſt and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

De aurea ſæculo, part 1.

And though (ſpeaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be aſcribed to Reaſon and Neceſſity ; yet it was God himſelf that firſt kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they ſaw that they could not live and be preſerved without a Ruler and Conductor : God himſelf by his Eternal providence having ordained Kings ; and the Law of Nature, Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince ; the Deer their Leaders ; and Cranes (by order impoſed) watch for their own ſafety. The moſt high beareth rule over the Kingdoms of Men ; and appointeth over it whomſoever he pleaſeth. By me (ſaith Wiſdom , ſpoken by the Son of God) Kings reign ; By me Princes rule. And it is God (ſaith Daniel) that ſetteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Chriſt himſelf witneſſeth, ſpeaking to Pilate ; Thou couldeſt have no power at all againſt me, except it were given thee from above.

Dan. 5.21. Prov. 8. 15. Dan. 2. 21. John 19. 11.

It was therefore by a threefold Juſtice that the World hath been Governed from the beginning (to wit) by a Juſtice natural ; by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephews, and Families ; in which government the Obedience was called natural Piety : Again, by a Juſtice divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God ; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conſcience : And laſtly, by a Juſtice civil , begotten by both the former ; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by theſe three, thoſe of the eldeſt times were commanded, and that the rule in general was Paternal, it is moſt evident : for Adam , being Lord over his own Children, inſtructed them in the ſervice of God his Creator ; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

SECT. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Government, with their oppoſites : and of the degrees of humane ſociety.

WHat other Policy was exerciſed , or State founded, after ſuch time as man-kind was greatly multiplied before the Flood , it cannot be certainly known , though it ſeem by probable conjecture , that the ſame was not without Kings in that firſt Age : It being poſſible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the general Flood ; and very likely, that the cruel Oppreſſions in that Age proceeded from ſome Tyranny in Government , or ſome rougher form of Rule, than the Paternal.

Beroſus aſcribeth the Rule of the World in thoſe days to the Gyants of Libanus, who maſtered (ſaith he) all Nations from the Sun-riſing to the Sun-ſet. But in the ſecond Age of the World, and after ſuch times as the rule of Elderſhip failed, three ſeveral ſorts of Government were in ſeveral times eſtabliſhed among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

Beroſ. l. 1.

The firſt, moſt Antient, moſt general, and moſt approved, was the Government of one , ruling by juſt Laws, called Monarchy : to which Tyranny is oppoſed, being alſo a ſole and abſolute Rule, exerciſed according to the will of the Commander , without reſpect or obſervation of the Laws of God, or Men. For a lawful Prince or Magiſtrate (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity : and of this condition ought every Magiſtrate to be, according to the Rule of Gods Word: Judges and Officers ſhalt thou make thee in thy Cities : and theſe ſhall judg the people with righteous judgment.

Deut. 16. 18.

The ſecond Government , is of divers principal Perſons eſtabliſhed by Order, and ruling by Laws, called Ariſtocracy, or Optimatum poteſtas ; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and uſurpation of a few great ones) is oppoſed : as the Decemviri, or Trium viri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is oppoſed Ochlocratia , or the Turbulent unjuſt ruling of the confuſed multitude, ſeditiouſly ſwaying the State, contrary to their own Laws and Ordinances. Theſe three kinds of Government are briefly expreſt by Tholoſanus ; unius, paucorum, & multorum ; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of Policy ſince the ſecond increaſe of mankind , the ſame grew in this ſort : Firſt of all, every Father, or eldeſt of the Family, gave Laws to his own iſſues, and to the people from him and them increaſed. Theſe, as they were multiplied into many houſholds (man by nature loving ſociety) joyning their Cottages together in one common Field or Village , which the Latins call Vicus ; of the Greek οἶκος, which ſignifies a Houſe ; or of the word (Via) becauſe it hath divers ways and paths leading to it. And as the firſt Houſe grew into a Village, ſo the Village into that which is called Pagus (being a ſociety of divers Villages) ſo called of the Greeks πάγη whioh ſignifieth a Fountain : becauſe many people (having their habitations not far aſunder) drank of one Spring or Stream of Water. To this word the Engliſh Hundreds, or (as ſome think) Shires , anſwereth not unfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather ſtrength, and as emulation and pride, between the Race of the one and the other, daily increaſed : ſo both to defend themſelves from out-rage , and to preſerve ſuch goods as they had gathered, they began to joyn and ſet together divers of their Villages, invironing them firſt with Banks and Ditches, and afterwards with Walls : which, being ſo compaſſed, were then called Oppida ; either ab opponendo ſe hoſtibus, Becauſe Walls were oppoſed againſt Enemies ; or ab opibus, becauſe thither they gathered their riches for ſafety and defence : as alſo they were called Urbes, ab orbe ; becauſe when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (ſaith Varro) therewith meaſuring and compaſſing the ground which they went to incloſe or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was antiently in this, that Urbs ſignifieth no other than the very Walls, and Buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein : ſo called of Civis, and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coivit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within in these Walls are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City, may by turns become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest go under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same general name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chief Magistrate, if he be to be tearmed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greek word (Megistos) and so the Greeks call them Megistanes, whom the Latins call Magnates, or Magistratus.

Eth. 5. The Office and Duty of every Magistrate, Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their Duties and Office. Rom 13.4. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in the same place; Ver. 1. 2. That every soul ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgment and condemnation of Man, but of God: Ibid. v. 5. For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments, upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a Tyrannous hand: and the Commandment of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himself subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himself and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in Authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostom, in his Homily to the people, prefer Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a Tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse, quàm nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: Neque enim libertus tutior ulla est (saith Claudian) quàm Domino servire bono; No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly, howsoever it may be disputed, yet it is safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000 Tyrants: under a wise man that is cruel, than under the foolish and Barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta, that desired an alteration of Government, That kind of Rule which a man would disdain in his own house, were very unfit to govern great Regions by.

Hierem. 29. 7. Gen. 20. 17 & 27. 10.

Lastly, as many Fathers erect many Cottages for their many Children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Housholds joyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joyned together, and established Laws by consent, associating themselves under one Governour, and Government; they, so joyned, were called a Comman-wealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the People themselves.

SECT. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

NOW this first Age after the Flood; and after such time as the people were increased, and Families became strong, and they dispersed into several parts of the World, was by antient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent Buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the Cold, the Rain and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the antient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those Elder times; but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the Infancy of Empiry) when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age; may the beginning of all Princes times be truly be called Golden. For be it that men affect Honour, it is then best purchased; or if Honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least Impediments: and if Liberality overflow her Banks and Bounds, the same is then best warranted both by Policie and Example. But Age and Time, do not only harden and shrink the openest and most Jovial hearts, but the Experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torn Estates before their eyes, and (withal) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose means are answerable unto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their own respects, do no sooner find their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the Times injurious and Iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his days be many: for our younger years are our Golden Age, which being eaten up by time, we praise those Seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and diseases which never part from us but at the grave, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of Man's nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever: Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to pass (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we always extol the time past, and hold the present fastidious. For it is one of the Errors of way-ward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-passed times, forgetting this advice of Solomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former days were better than these? For thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Majores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur, posteri querentur, everſos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancestors have complained, we do complain, our Children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are usually the Discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandoque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus; quibus cœpit nova fuit & repentina. Whatsoever is new in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they took beginning were also new and sudden. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set down for certain, That as it was the virtue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns; so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono servit omne bonum; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only: For he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or disposition of men.

SECT. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without Virtue.

Virus Nobilis non nascitur sed fit.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly Authority, began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which Imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age, to these days. But this Nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Blood, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excel, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in virtue, were so called: Hinc dictis Nobilis, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Jerom judged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent: I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degegenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtus & antiquæ divitiæ; Virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of virtue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Virtue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Papers, which ignorant men worship instead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remain but the dregs and Vices of ancient Virtue: Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of Soyl and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foul, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertili producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, ex terra sterili pretiosum Aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poysoning Henbane, and out of barren Soyl precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weal. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being descended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Author calleth personal (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also Personal; yet if Virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility, by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such an one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility, which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings, with the change of their Fancies, wish they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely, if we had as much sence of our degenerating in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Potshare body and barren mind? For (according to the same Father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris hujus, & malè coronatæ nitorem gloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers womb. Camest thou thence with thy Mytre, or glystering with Jewels, or garnish- garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration, as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man; and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is born; and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith St. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily perswade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade — Phart.
Of virtuous life; not in the fleshly Line:
For bloud is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And howsoever the custom of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Solomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow-Princes: There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an errour that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth: Folly is set in great excellency. Eccles. 10.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

SECT. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like a Sovereign Lord, and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THE first of all that reigned as Sovereign Lord, after the Floud, was Nimrod, the Son of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to S. Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of fame, and took on him to command others: or else, in that he was begotten by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grandchildren and Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expres words, calleth Nimrod the Son of Chush, other mens conjectures to the contrary, ought to have no respect.

This Empiry of Nimrod, both the Fathers, and many later Writers call tyrannical: the same beginning in Babel (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me, that Melanchon conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Authour of that Work, called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter, or severe Governour, because his form of Rule seemed, at first, farr more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore he is in this respect also called A mighty Hunter: because he took and destroyed both beasts and thieves. But S. Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be understood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (A mighty Hunter) be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himself, or any of the Sons of his own body, came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by divers Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Joctan, were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so farr as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Son's Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the generall opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldæa, about the City of Ur, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldæa, were no partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hæc lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius) and this Language Abraham used; yea, it was anciently, and before the Floud, the general speech: and therefore first called (saith Cælestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely, but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than violence of usurpation.

SECT.

SECT. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct Persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Nauclerus, with others, make many Nimrods; Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierom upon Ose; and these words of Saint Augustine seem to make him of the same Opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos; There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who governed in Babylon sixty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly, it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus his time, the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cæsar overthrew the liberty of the Roman Common-wealth, making himself perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first established Emperour, and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of soveraign rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with general allowance, exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them, both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the Floud (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For, so Edward the third, and his Grand-child, Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is farr more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For, it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining: but the first, and most famous work of Ninus, was the City of Ninive.

Now, whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppresst the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time,

——Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with walls of Brick, the City did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's Arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For, if we may believe Justine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt and Tanais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For, whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early, for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so farr removed from Babel, namely, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one Person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the Floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hand.

Besides, whereas these Cities, in many mens opinions, are found to stand farr away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint calls Archard; and Epiphanius, Arphal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive, to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran, are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus, out of S. Hierom, calls Achad: and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Pagninus, Erec; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Camagena, called Arace; and indeed, likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalne) some take it for Calinisis: of which Am. Mercellinus. S. Hierom takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus, for Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and raised by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this Dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldæa (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think, with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then Lib. 23. Cap. 6. v. 2.

to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva Translation, favouring the former Opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chalde, from Babylon in Egypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now, that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

SECT. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive; and that it is probable, out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOW, as of Nimrod; so are the Opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Assyria: a controversie wearisomly disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the Interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not dis-joyn the sence of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel, & Erec, & Accad, & Chalne, in terra Shinaaris: è terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi ædificavit Niniven (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Nineve. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any Person, but for the Region of Assyria; the Land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the Son of Shem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For, in the beginning of the tenth Chapter, he setteth down the Sons of Noah, in these words: Now these are the generations of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately; The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest, because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons: first, the Issue of Gomer, Japheths eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after, he numbreth the Sons of Ham, of which Chush and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not dis-joyn the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Sela, and Heber, unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Sons of Shem, in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have past over so sleightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire in one of the Sons of Shem, if he had had any such means: it being the Story of Shem's Sons which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sons of Chush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter, he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the Issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israel. And of Junius opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive P. Comestor, in historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who, after he had delivered this place in some other sence, he useth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur, filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est, Regnum Assyriorum) inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the Son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, Which is also true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the Son of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Niterbiensis, Saint Hierom, and Cyrillus, and now lastly, Torniellus: who (saith he) took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his Conquest in Africa; and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psal. 81. Esay. 10. Ose. 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the Son of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-Bishop of Mentz in the year of Christ 854. an Ancient and Learned Writer, understands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that Translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this sence: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli, filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnum, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversity in the Translation and Understanding; in so much as Michael de Palatio upon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the State of the Chaldæans, therefore also Assur, rather than Nimrod, established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former Translation of Junius, and his own Opinion. Now, out of the Vulgar (called Hierom's Trans-

Torniel. Annal. sacr. in Gen. 10.

Translation) it may be gathered, that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldæans, by Esay remembred: unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians, that they cannot trust or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldæa, and that Estate, an example unto those Phœnicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which City of Chaldæa, being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soon after be overturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nebuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierom: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxerunt robustos ejus, fossoderunt domos ejus, posuerunt eam in ruinam (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, such a People there were not (or, this was no People, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their Houses, and ruined their City. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldæorum, & hæc desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sence perfect by the preceding verse, which altogether may be thus understood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon, or Greece) yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldæans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their Walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus: Ecce terra Chasdiim, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ædes ejus, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for Ships, they erected the Towers thereof; and again brake down the Houses thereof, and ruinated it. Junius, in the place of Ships, sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted, that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sence of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatness of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis, from the Macedonians, and other Grecians, under the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldæans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our Discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chief merchandize came in by the City Ur, or Urchoa in Chaldæa, where the body or chief stream of Euphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be stopped up. For, as we have heretofore noted, the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; and of Euphrates, that is, from Ur, or Urchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land, they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre; as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldæa, through which, that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopt up. Hujus cursum vetustas abolevit (saith Niger.) And Pliny: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worn away the Channel of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terrour of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Ur; and by Hecatæus, Camerina; by Ptolomy, Urchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldæopolis, the City of Chaldæa: which the Sons of Shem, until Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas, in all the Translations, it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the Son of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Ur of Chaldæa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus & Pagninus converted (by Ships) do bear that sence, the same may be the bter approved, because it was a Port Town; and the River so far up as this City of Ur was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no less manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next People of all other unto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth Desart Lands, because it joyneth to that part of Arabia so called; and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ituræans) addeth, that they are, of all other People, the most Salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary Opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former Translation of Junius, nor the Interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Assur is in this place diversly taken (as for the Son of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Ur; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seem to enforce it. And so this Founding of the City of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the Posterity of Shem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatry of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove the same Assur built Nineve, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the Son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the Son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now, if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Family of Shem, as he must be, if he founded Ninive, then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur, whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the Son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly, he was very unworthy, and obscure, and not like to be the Founder der of such an Empire, and such a City, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to Posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire again, or quitted it to Ninus: whose Acts and Conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the Story of that Age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the same stream that Babel and Chalne did: which work his Grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundress of the City which she only finished; so also Ninus of Nineve: Quam quidam Babylonem potuit instaurare; She might repair or renew Babylon, saith St. Augustine. For so did Nebuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the Wall, over-born by the fury of the River: which work of his stood till Alexander's time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built? Dan. 4. 27.

SECT. IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

But to return to the Story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium, and Julius Africanus firnamed Saturn) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembred; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, and in Assyria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it self, and those adjoyning; and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinaar: that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of Materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successours in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an encrease of People; and the Examples and Patterns of his beginning, so great advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terræque divisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 years; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm ground of all those great Fens and overflown Marishes which adjoyned unto it. For any of his Wars or Conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia, which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose Son and Successour Barzanes became Subject and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the War to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

SECT. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

That so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod (as by the Story of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity, being a Princess liberal and powerful, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding minds of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for; so as every Leader of a Troop (after the division of Tongues, and dispersion of People) finding these fair offers made unto them, held the power which they possest, and governed by discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their destined places. For, it cannot be conceived, that when the earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like Beasts in a Desart, but that by agreement they disposed themselves, and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus his time, would not have been possest in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous success) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod, with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their own Travels; nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence; nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these Causes had wrought these Effects, the undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent; for he fonnd every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no Companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Sovereignty and sole Commandment of all those the Children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia; though in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successour) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia sufficiently powerful to resist his attempts; which Sabatius, I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, that Mizraim had been this Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some errour (as Justine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me, rightly rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Sesostris, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 years, according to the common account.

SECT. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affines unto it.

WHence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bell, or Belus, question hath been made; for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus, Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himself to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bell, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldæan Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldæan Princes and Babylonian Satrapæ: so was it used by the chief of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldæan, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps Militiæ, Chief in the War; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierom makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification: and saith, That the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped; to which, that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyranus) came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old, or ancient; adding, That as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturn, and the Sun; so in the Punick or Carthaginian Language, it signifieth God: Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly; & Josephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth, That the Idol wch the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountain Phegor, or Peor, & called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the Opinion of Saint Hierom. But, that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say, as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel soundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jews express the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth us the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himself; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For, although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be justly to be used towards God; yet in respect that the same was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbad it. And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldæans for the Sun, was not, because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sun there was worshipped as God; as also the Fire was; tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belsephon; Belsephon is expounded out of Facius; Dominus speculæ, vel custodiæ: The Lord of the Watch-tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is written Belpeor, or Baalpeor; and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudavit; and therefore the word joyned, expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Saturn: for it was used among the Ancients, to name the Father Saturn, the Son Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regumque qui urbes condiderunt senissimi; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero Nepotes eorum fortissimi. The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturns; their first-born Jupiters and Junoes; and their valiant Nephews, Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Vives) was famous for his Warlike Son Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by Dreams of their Antiquities) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) upon Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Ægyptus. They add, That this Belus, carrying a Colony to the River Euphrates, there built a City, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But, were there any Belus the Son of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Lybia, or (with Eusebius) of Teglonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speak; but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

SECT. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Astronomy, if Pliny say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth, that it did remain in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Over the River, saith he, there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramis made of Brick, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril against Julian, that he obtained divine worship yet living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseverârunt igitur Assyrii, & finitimæ illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their Subjects with title of Deity, (or with the name of God) the Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persevered, sacrificing to him. Even Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an Idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

of the Planet Mars; a man of sharp and fierce disposition, who bidding battel to Caucasus, of the stock of Japheth, slew him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that any among Idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soon after: though I deny not, but that the most of their Images and Statuæ were first erected without divine worship, only in the memory of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterward the Devil crept into those woodden & brazen Carcasses, when Posterity had lost the memory of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt, homines fuerunt, & pro uniuscujusque vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud suos post mortem cœperunt: sed (Dæmonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memorea honoraverunt, minores Deos existimârunt: ad ista vero magis ex colenda accesserunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence, began after his death to be honoured of his own: But, at length (the Devil perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the Opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And, that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth, but Gregory: Gentilitas (saith he) inventrix & caput est Imaginum: Gentilism is the Inventress and ground of Images; and Ambrose, Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam Imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adored wood, as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images, a Custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like saith Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith Lactantius) ne Religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They fear their Religion would be vain, should they not see what they worship.

Lact. lib. 2. cap. 2.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolmen shift this fearful custom very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfy it self with the distinction of Doulia, and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expresly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practicers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the express Commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatning of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any perswasions lead the hearts of men from it. For, where shall we find words of greater weight, or plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image, or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And, besides the express Commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition of many Scriptures; so it is written in the Book of Wisdom, That, the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolmen affirm, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest, that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal, and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption unlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do those men presume, that put him under the greasie Pencil of a Painter, or the rusty Ax or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God, began in Babel: so did the Devil transport and spread this invention into all the Regions adjoyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans, for a while, resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170 years; observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impiety to resemble things most beautiful, by things most base. But, Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a Nation of all others under the Sun most deluded by Satan) set up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicant, genu posito illa adorant; & cum hæc suspiciant, fabros, qui illa fecere, contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray unto, with bended knees those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemn the Handicrasismen that made them; which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at:

Aug. de civit. l. 4. c. 31.

Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde siniſtro
Religiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra, suumque
Factorem fugiunt, & quæ fecere, verentur!
Quis furor est? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit?
Ut volucrem, turpemque bovem, torvumque Draconem,
Semi-hominemque-canem supplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumb Idols in their heart;
Who their own Maker (God on high) despise,
And fear the work of their own hands and Art!
What fury? what great madness doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should ugly shapes adore
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile
Half-dog-half-man on knees for aid implore.

And though this device was barbarous, and first, and many years practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laughed to scorn the Ignorant stupidity of his Nation: but Justin Martyr remembreth how the Sybils inveighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the Souls of men to erect and adore those babels. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Persians did not erect or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impiety to represent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth, in his Sixth Book, de præparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brackmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might be remembred, that witness the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatry: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine Imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt, All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen, at first, made these Statuæ and Images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and Common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuitatem merentium: Men are not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some natable cause to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more antient Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea discerent homines Deum invisibilem cognoscere: Images, say they, (and so before them the Heathen said) are instead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the invisible God: in which understanding, perhaps, they no other ways esteemed them than Pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal, or Bel, set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reverenced Idol of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away; so those very stocks and stones, and painted canvases (called the Pictures of Christ, our Lady, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not only adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Book of Wisdom) when we pass through the raging waves, on these stocks more rotten than the Ship that carries us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dii consentes, seu majorum gentium, selecti, Patritii, insigniores, dii medii: Counselling gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobility, select gods, Patrian, gods of mark, and Common gods (which the Romans called Medioxum) dii infimi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which S. Augustine hath made large mention, in his Book, de Civitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable souls, and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which stood with the same title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devil had so many years led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them, as Jupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens, Minerva, in Samos, Juno, in Paphos, Venus, and so of all other parts; but every City, and almost every Family, had a god apart. For, as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Babel made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima, and the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which, how plainly hath the Prophet Esay derided? Men cut down Trees, rind them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god, an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian, to believe the Commandments of God, so direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul, who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flie from Idolatry; I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

SECT. VIII.

Of the Warrs of Ninus: and lastly, of his Warr against Zoroaster.

UNto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first that, without shame or fear, committed Adultery in publick. But, as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of prophane Authors) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For, although that piece of Berosus, set out and commented upon by Annius, hath many good things it it, and giveth great light (as Chytræus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnasseus, and others: yet, Lodovicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proving directly, that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by Athenæus and Josephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Nimrod, to the eighteenth King Ascatades, and to the times of Josua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers; or some few lines of the Chaldæan and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards, in the collection of the Persian Kings, is not without his errours.

Athen. lib. 1. Joseph. cont. Appian. l. 1. & 7.

Ctesias, or Cnidus (a City joyning to Halicarnasseus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farr upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and, though in the Story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias, and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the Times and Princes with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his Works, saving some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can express them. S. Augustine affirms, that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wan it all, save India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia, the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a streight league of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and and a Chusite and the neereſt Prince confronting Babylonia. His firſt enterprize was upon Syria, which he might eaſily ſubdue, both becauſe he invaded it on the ſudden, and becauſe it lay next him: and alſo becauſe the Arabians and their King Arieus (which bordered Syria) aſſiſted him in the Conqueſt thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his Warr againſt Zoroaſter: for from Armenia, he bent himſelf that way toward the Eaſt; but, that ever he commanded the leſſer Aſia, I do not believe, for none of his Suceſſors had any poſſeſſion therein.

His third Warr was againſt Pharnus, King of the Medes, whom it is ſaid that he overthrew, and cruelly murthered with his ſeven Children; though others affirm, that they all died in one battel againſt him. Whether he invaded Zoroaſter before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is ſaid, that he made two Expeditions into Bactria: and, that finding little or ill ſucceſs in the firſt, he returned, and ſet the work of Ninive forward: and then a ſecond time entred Bactria with 1700000 Foot, and 200000 Horſe, and 100000 ſix hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaſter with four hundred thouſand. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaſter being ſlain, he entred farther into the Countrey, and beſieged the chief City thereof, called Bactria, or Bactrion (ſaith Stephanus) which by a paſſage found, and an aſſault given by Semiramis (the Wife of Menon) he entred and poſſeſt. Upon this occaſion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her perſon and external beauty, fancied her ſo ſtrongly, as (neglecting all Princely reſpects) he took her from her Husband, whoſe eyes he threatned to thruſt out, if he refuſed to conſent. He therefore yielding to the paſſion of love in Ninus, and to the paſſion of ſorrow in himſelf, by the ſtrong perſwaſions of ſhame and diſhonour, caſt himſelf headlong into the Water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaſter, ſuppoſed to have been the chief Authour of Magick Arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

SECT. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt inventer of Aſtrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

ZOroaſter, King of the Bactrians, Vincentius ſuppoſeth to be Cham the Son of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the Paternal Anceſtour of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whoſe Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that Book which was called Scripturæ Cham, deviſed by ſome wicked Knave, and ſo entituled; of which Sixtus Senenſis hath made the due mentions.

Caſſian in Oct. Col. cap. 21.

It is reported by Caſſianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham the Son of Noah: ſo did Comeſtor in his Scholaſtical Hiſtory; which Art (ſaith he) with the ſeven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: ſeven of which were made of Braſs, to reſiſt the defacing by the Waters of the Floud; and ſeven of Brick, againſt the injury of fire. There was alſo another deviſed Diſcourſe, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Caſſianus out of Serenus hath ſomewhat like this of Comeſtor. Theſe be Caſſianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui ſuperſtitionibus iſtis & ſacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, ſciens nullum ſe poſſe ſuper his memorialem librum in Arcam prorſus inferre, in qua erat cum patre juſto, &c. Cham (the Son of Noah) who was infected with theſe ſuperſtitions and ſacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, cauſed the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in Metal, and hard Stone.

Saint Auguſtine noteth, that Zoroaſter was ſaid to have laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which preſaged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto; being taken for the Inventer of natural Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, ſaith Pliny and Juſtine. But I do not think that Zoroaſter invented the doctrine of the Horoſcopes, or Nativities: or firſt found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and Minerals, or their Sympathetical, or Antipathetical workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldæa is alſo made the Inventer. I rather think that theſe knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham, who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaſter (as Joſephus reporteth) was no leſs learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wiſdom of after-times in this, that he knew, and acknowledged, the true cauſe and giver of life and virtue to Nature, and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, diſperſed, and univerſal power) admired the Inſtruments, and did attribute proper ſtrength to the things themſelves (from which the effects were ſenſible) which belonged to that wiſdom, Which being one, and remaining in it ſelf, can do all things, and reneweth all.

Wiſd. 7.

Now, whether this Zoroaſter (overthrown by Ninus) were the ſame which was ſo excellent a Natura-

Naturaliſt, it is doubted. For Zoroaſter the Magician, Cteſias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaſter were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midſt of his Diſciples) as ſome Authors report, then Zoroaſter, ſlain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is alſo the opinion of Scaliger.

Scalig. in Fuſeb. Joſeph. l. 1. Antiq. c. 4.

Again, Joſephus, and Cedrenus affirm, that Seth firſt found out the Planets, or wandring Stars, and other motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaſter, he could not have attained to any ſuch excellency therein, in his own lifetime; but being a man (as it ſeemeth) of ſingular judgment, he might add ſomewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to Poſterity.

But of this Zoroaſter, there is much diſpute: and no leſs jangling about the word and Art of Magick. Arnobius remembreth four, to whom the name of Zoroaſter, or Zoroaſtres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dinon ſeemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of Art, and was as much to ſay, as Aſtrorum cultor. The firſt, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the ſame that Ninus overthrew: the ſecond, a Chaldæan, and the Aſtronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaſter Pamphylius, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaſter Armenius, the Nephew of Hoſtianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus, there paſt threeſcore and eighteen years. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Perſomedus ſapiens: and Plato ſpeaketh of Zoroaſter the Son of Oromaſdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now, of what Nation the firſt and chief Zoroaſter was, it is doubted. Pliny and Laertius make him a Perſian. Gemiſtheus, or Pletho, Ficinus, and Steuchius, make him a Chaldæan. But by thoſe Books of one Zoroaſter, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldæan by Nation, though the word (Chaldæan) was as often given to the learned Prieſts peculiarly, as for any diſtinguiſhment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldæi and Magi divers; Picus, the ſame. But that this Zoroaſter was a Chaldæan both by Nation and Profeſſion, it appeareth by his Books, which (ſaith Picus) were written in the Chaldæan Tongue; and the Comment in the ſame Language. Now, that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of thoſe Books of Zoroaſter, which in an Epiſtle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he ſaith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroaſtris & Melchior magorum oracula.

SECT. II.

Of the name of Magia; and that it was Anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witch-craft.

Pic. Mir. fol. 81.

NOW, for Magick it ſelf, which Art (ſaith Mirandula) Pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few underſtand, and many reprehend; Et ſicut Canes ignotos ſemper allatrant; As Dogs bark at thoſe they know not: ſo they condemn and hate the things they underſtand not: I think it not amiſs (leaving Ninus for a while), to ſpeak ſomewhat thereof.

It is true, that many men abhorr the very name and word (Magos) becauſe of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but goes (that is) familiar with evil Spirits, uſurped that Title. For Magick, Conjuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant, ſcoffeth thereat. For Nero (ſaith Pliny) who had the moſt excellent Magicians of the Eaſt, ſent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the Art, after long ſtudy and labour, altogether ridiculous.

Plin. l. 30. Hiſt. Nat. Porphyr. & Apul.

Magus is a Perſian word primitively, whereby is expreſt ſuch a one as is altogether converſant in things Divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of worſhipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epiſtles expounding the word (μάγος) ſaith, that the Perſians called their god μάγυς: whence he addeth, that Magus is either ὁ καλὸ φύσιν θεὸς, or ἐπαοιδὸς θεῶν (that is) that Magus is a name ſometimes of him that is a God by nature; ſometimes of him that is in the ſervice of God: in which latter ſence it is taken, Mat. 2. v. 1. And this is the firſt and higheſt kind: which Piccolominie calleth divine Magick: and theſe did the Latines newly entitle Sapientes, or Wiſemen: For, the fear and worſhip of God is the beginning of knowledge. Theſe Wiſemen the Greeks call Philoſophers: the Indians, Branchmans; which name they ſomewhat neerly retain to this day, calling their Prieſts Bramines; among the Egyptians they were tearmed Prieſts; with the Hebrews they were called Cabaliſts, Prophets, Scribes, and Phariſees: amongſt the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldæans: and among the Perſians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (ſpeaking of Hoſtanes, one of the ancient Magicians) uſeth theſe words: Et verum Deum merita majeſtate proſequitur, & Angelos miniſtros Dei, ſed veri ejus venerationi novit aſſiſtere. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Soſtenes (for ſo M. Felix called him, not Hoſtanes) aſcribeth the due Majeſty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are miniſters and meſſengers which attend the Worſhip of the true God. He alſo hath delivered, that there are Devils Earthly, and wandring, and enemies to mankind.

Plato in Alcil. Piccol. de Defin. Prov. 1. 7. John Hug. Linſchot. In octavio Minutii Felicis cum Arnobio p. 360.

His Majeſty alſo, in his firſt Book of Demonologie, ch. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Perſian Tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of divine and Heavenly ſcience; but unjuſtly ſo called, becauſe the Chaldæans were Ignorant of the true Divinity. And it is alſo right which His Majeſty avoweth, that under the name of Magick, all other unlawful Arts, are comprehended; and yet doth His Majeſty diſtinguiſh it from Necromancy, Witch-craft, and the reſt: of all which he hath written largely, and moſt learnedly. For the Magick which His Majeſty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a party. Daniel in his ſecond Chap. nameth four kinds of thoſe Wiſemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latine Tranſlation calleth Sophiſtas: Vatablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Phyſicos, or Philoſophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturaliſts: Nempe ſunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philoſophi apud Græcos (ſcilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum ſcientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the ſame with the Barbarians, as the Philoſophers are with the Grecians (that is) men that profeſs the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greek and the Engliſh call them Inchanters; Junius, Magicians; Caſtalion, Conjecturers: in the Syrian, they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wiſemen of Babel.

Dæmonol. l. 2. c. 1.

The ſecond ſort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our our English, call Astrologers; Hierom and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici or Venefici; in Hierom, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners: in Junius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeed there is a kind of Malefici, which, without any Art of Magick or Necromancie, use the help of the Devil to do mischief, His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Devil prepared; and at other times to make Pictures of Wax, or Clay, (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things which the Devil by other means bringeth to pass.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldæans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well natural as humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the Influences of the Stars, by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are, the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly sought (as is the manner of all Impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferiour degrees.

A second kind of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of Agriculture and Husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Stars into those lower Elements.

Philo Judæus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick, or Astrology, together with the motions of the Stars, and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldæa: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the Creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomie, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these Sciences.

De vit. sanct. Glyc. Annal fol. 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garsias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus, Chaldæos primum, deinde Phænices, demum Ægyptos Sacredotes Astrologiam & divina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm, that Abraham, the holiest and the wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldæans, then the Phenicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie, and divine Knowledge.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophy of Nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of Nature's hidden bosome to humane use: Virtutes in centro centri latentes: Virtues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder times, and who better understood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyranæus, remembred by S. Hierom to Paulinus; in some mens Opinion, Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Thespian: among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profest, is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant, non sine eorum sine admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise-man, to the bringing forth of such effects as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In these three kinds, which other men divide into four, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned; especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Universal: he believeth of the * Trinity, which he could not investigate by any natural knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approveth the immortality of the Soul: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others, have gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phænicians, using Zoroaster's own words: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibi-ipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus pater juris, sine doctrina justitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God, the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the only Inventer thereof.

Lib. 2. fol. 26.

Sixtus Senensis, speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldæans, doth distinguish those wise men into five Orders (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldæans; Asaphim, or Magicians; Chartumim (which he translates Ariolie, or Sophists) Mechasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poysoners; and Gazarim, Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldæans, which were Astronomers: Hi cælorum motus diligentissimè speculâruut; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the Heavens: whom Philo, in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint, and of Hierom, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane: Origen makes Balaam (the Son of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the Invention of this Art to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith St. Augustine, Pliny, and Justine) of another Zoroaster, who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancestors.

Mechasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of His Majesties Book of Dæmonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after St. Hierom) which divine from the Intrails of Beasts slain for Sacrifices: or by Gazarim, others understand Augures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of Birds.

By this distinction, we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For Peucer truly observeth, Præerant religioni gioni Persicæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, studiisque veræ Philosophiæ dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq; percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophy: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his own words are these: Et ne quem moveant præmissa Polychronii & Theophili, testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram ubique ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita, aut verè, aut apparenter, operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad practicem naturalis Philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium; That the Testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood, that Magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by Covenants made with Devils; the other Commended by Origen, which appertaineth to the practick part of natural Philosophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of Natural Virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally.

Bibl. l. 6. fol. 424.

This Partition Hierom doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel, where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of Wise Men formerly remembred, he useth this distinction: Quos nos hariolos, cæteri ἐπῳδοὺς (id est) incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; Malefici, qui sanguine utuntur, & victimis, & sæpe contigunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldæis Genethlaicos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quòd sunt Philosophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis hujus scientiam, Reges quoq; & Principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate domini Salvatoris, ipsi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethlehem, adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seem to me, such as perform things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing Philosophically; Witches, that use blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldæans, I take them to be signified by the name of Conjecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldæans: yea, King and Princes of that Nation do all that they do, according to this Art: whence, at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they first of all understood his birth, & coming unto holy Bethlehem, did worship the Child: the Star from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth, that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirm, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunque; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Devil, useth his help to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which undergo that Title, were invented by the falshood, subtilty, and envy of the Devil. In the latter, there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies, Per malam fidem; By an evil Faith: in the former, no other ill, than the investigation of those virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work, to things that suffer. And though by the Jews those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were tearmed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custom (saith S. Hierom) understandeth Witches, under the name of Magicians: And Antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expavescis Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat, & Sacerdotem? O thou fearful one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gratious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch or a Conjurer, but a wise man, and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that Study and profession, but onely idle Ignorance, the Parent of causless admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonorum, naturas ipsas vel conjungentiam, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropriè vocant. The marvellousness of some works, which (indeed) are natural, hath been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of devils, joyning the natures together, or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly, Necromancy.

Gul. Parisien de Lege, cap. 14.

Mirandula in his Apology goeth further: For by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of natural agents, we are assisted to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) Ignoratis terminis potentiæ, & virtutis rerum naturalium, stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The terms or limits of natural power and virtue not understood, we must needs doubt, whether those very works which Christ did, may not be done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hæreticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholickly, that by such Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought, were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years, fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, That the uttermost of Nature's works being known, the works which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could do, do manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely Supreme and Divine; and thereby those that were faithless, were thereby converted, or put to silence.

SECT.

SECT. III.

That the knowledge in the antient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things, under the name and colour of good things.

SEeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinorum Cultor, & Interpres: A studious Observer and Expounder of Divine things: and the Art of it self (I mean the Art of Natural Magick) no other, Quàm naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio; than the absolute perfection of natural Philosophy: Certainly then, it proceeds from ignorance, and no way sorteth with wise and learned men, promiscuè, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawful and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath shuffled, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceless men. For, if we condemn natural Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Devil (who knows more than any man) doth also teach Witches and Poisoners the harmful parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we, by the same rule, condemn the Physician, and the Art of Healing. For the Devil also in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreams, what Herbs and Drugs were proper for such and such Diseases. Now, no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath sought to thrust himself into the same employment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himself for that purpose into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrology, by giving a divine power to the Stars, teaching men to esteem them as gods, and not as instruments. Bunt in Chro. And (as Bunting observeth) it is true, that judicial Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art, considering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have, and exercise their operation upon the inferiour. For the Sun and the Star of Mars do drie; the Moon doth moisten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have several and proper names, so have they several and proper virtues: the Stars do also differ in beauty, and in magnitude; and to all the Stars hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) Psal. 147. needed not: He counteth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But, into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the Devil ceaseth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret virtues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and incantations; and taught men to believe in the strength of Words and Letters (which, without Faith in God, are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the All-powerful Word of God, or to diminish the glory of God's creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wise and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the shores, and flie into the Land, that commonly some great storm followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken fair weather; that the crying of Crows, and bating of Ducks, foreshew Rain: for they feel the Air moistened in their quils. And it is written in Hieremy the Prophet, Even the Stork in the Air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Cap. 8. v. 7. Hereupon, this enemy of Man-kind, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen, by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill success in the War: and (withall) to look into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds, and Beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sarah to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by a Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Solomon, Paul, Ananius, the Magi of the East, and others. Gen. 12. v. 17. For as it is remembred in Job: In Dreams and Visions of the night, when sleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cause man to return from his enterprise; therefore, I say, doth the Devil also practise his Divinations by dreams, or (after Parisiensis) divinitatis imitationes, his mock-Divinity. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephimerides of his own Dreams: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea, the Romans, finding the inconvenience hereof, because all Dreams (without distinction of cases) were drawn to Divination, forbad the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi) it may appear. Likewise by the Law of God, in Deuteronomy, Chap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slain. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous diseases that oppress him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemie's poisoned Wound; nor that which Saint Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise, whose Son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a Dream, where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: not that of Astyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for as much as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

SECT. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nebuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie all their Practices.

BUt it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used, were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to pass, that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nebuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldæa, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slain. To this, divers answers may be given.

Deut. 13. and 18. Levit. 20.

First, It seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldæans, because they acknowledged that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by any Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldæans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the Power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, It may be conjectured (and that upon good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evil or unlawful Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawful, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction: for himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the Inchanters: of which some were tearmed Sooth-sayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldæans, others Magi, or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawful Arts (though not unlawful according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the King's thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then, in Daniel's dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

SECT. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evil, of falshood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: the Good, the Truth, the Purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Devil, in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was so adored.

Eust. ex Artapan. & Polybi. Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Starrs and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympathetical, and Antipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Ministers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physitians or Magician from the using of them to the help and comfort of Man-kind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Devil betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreams; so farr as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, The prohibition to mark flying of Fowls (as signs of good or evil success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For, if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemn all honest Trades and enterchange amongst men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge & all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornful and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew our selves, Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerent in hac luce: Unthankful towards towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light. Deut. 18. 20.

Indeed, not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also, and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned, judge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili quæritur, elucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the Glass of the Mathematicks, that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscuring, but in a neer and manifest representation. Cusa. Com. Theol. c. 1.

SECT. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magick.

IT is true, that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the Name Magick, and esteemed abusively to be branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy, or Goetia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal souls of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soul: and therefore the soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring, or raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These men are so distract, as they believe, that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) insconce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodness, no, not by the fearful Word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch, will yet resolve himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrifie with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the bodies and souls of those which raise them up; as His Majesty in his Book afore-named hath excellently taught: That the Devils obidience is onely, secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectivè, that is, upon bargain. Sunt in mundo genius quoddam potestatum valde divisum, indiscretum, & inconsideratum; & quod neque verum à falso, neque possibile discernit ab impossibili, L. Vivus. in cap. 11. lib. 10. Aug. de Civit. Dei, & ea. exercit. a.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and and ignorant Devils, which inhabit Iamblicus imagination; but sure I am, the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their servants and vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or, it may be that these Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardans mortals Devils, following the Opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphirius, who taught that these kind of Devils lived not above a Thousand years; which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For, were it true, that the Devils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alway fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the Air, cast him headlong out of his claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this, perhaps, were done by S. Peter's Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same pranks at other times, upon his own accord, the Devil played with Theodotus; who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortal fall that he had. The like success had Budas, a principal Pillar of the Manichæan Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth: and for a manifest proof hereof, we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Pegasus, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: For those that received not the truth (saith St. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions: Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the Second Book, and the Fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are meerly illusive. Another sort there are, who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals; of whom Cusanus: Fatui sunt Incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nails, or in Glass: for a spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

Euseb. hist. Eccl. lib. 5. cap. 16.

Lib. 1. c. 21.

Exercit. lib. 2.

There is also another art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withal. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so, seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the Professours thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministery of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances, and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, are men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Others sorts there are of wicked Divinations; as by Fire, called Pyromantia: by Water, called Hydromantia: by the Air, called Mataeotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other, is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practicers whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures, having sold their souls to the Devil, work two wayes; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian-fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly, if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

Ælian. l. 6. Nat. Hist.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians, a people of Italy, practised: Colubros disrumpit Marsia cantu: inchanting Marsia makes the Snakes to burst.) That it hath been used, it appears, Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kind, and even by natural causes it may be done. For, there are many fumes that will either draw them out, or destroy them; as womens hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magick or Inchantments than to draw out a piece of tosted Cheese.

Lucil. in Satyr.

SECT. VII.

By divers wayes by which the Devil seemeth to work his Wonders.

But to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other dominion than he hath (not speak of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he other wise worketh but three wayes. The first is, by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second, by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And, that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason disswadeth them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the onely certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatas (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. St. Augustine was of opinion, that the Frogs which Pharaoh's Sorcerers produced, were not natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For, as Varius observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof, saith Saint Augustine:

Sinl. paris. de universo p. 2. cap. 70.

Nec sanè Dæmones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creatæ sint commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt. The Devils create not any creatures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. Question he giveth the reason. Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet (that is) The Devil fills with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

Maxima vis est phantasiæ ad errores.

And, as Tertullian in his Book de Anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazel those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil entreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soul: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas, on the contrary, held, that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and St. Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per activa cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that St. Augustine doth believe that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned also, confirmeth. For, speaking of natural Magick, he useth these words: De hujusmodi autem operibus, & subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumq; animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verùm adhibitis adjutoriis, ipsâ seminanaturæ confortant, & accuunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solem Creatorem in his glorificant: In such works (saith he) the sudden generation of Frogs and Lice, and Worms, and some other creatures is: in all which, Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise, that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant, not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvel not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now, by these two wayes the Devils do most frequently work (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature, and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God onely.

For, shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests: and can infect the air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural? Or, may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder Ages he stole his knowledge out of the Predictions of the Prophets: and foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the World to this day, and observed the success of every counsel: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations; he that is of counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is a Prince of the air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabite the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea, if he should not very oftentimes ghess rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see, that wise and learned men do oftentimes by comparing like causes, conceive rightly of like effects before they happen: and yet, where the Devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles: as.

Eph. 2. 2. & 6. 12.

Diabolus magnum habet rerum usum quæ res multum habet momenti in quovis negotio Aug. de Anima, cap. 26. 27. &c.

Crœsus Halym penetrans magnam subvertit opum vim:

If Crœsus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus farr we grant the Devil may proceed in Predictions, which otherwise belong to God only, as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times, and certainly what is to come. Solius enim divinæ intelligentiæ est, occulta nosse & revelare; It is onely proper to Gods understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

Gui. Parisiensis de legib. c. 24.

SECT. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, It may be objected, that the Devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel, raised by the Witch of Endor; which, were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Devil's acts exceeded all the powers of Nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justin Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which Authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For, in his Questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animæ piorum à corpore separatæ, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem quæ secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant; The souls of the godly separated from their bodies, are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And (besides S. Augustine) Justin Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men, being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum à corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, rint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati divinæ commendari; We must believe, when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodness, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For, there are but two habitations after death: Unum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternal Fire; the other in Gods Eternal Kingdom. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe, that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloss upon the same Text finds it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Gloss) They believe, and they believe amiss, because they be but Phantasmes, or apparitions. For, whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the Soul of such a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atque deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian; Absit ut animam cujuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, à dæmonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we should think that the Soul of any holy man, much less of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

26. 15. Episcopi.

It is true, that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so do they the wooden Images, Cherubims: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a Book not numbred among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Syracides, following the literal sence and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: For, though the Devil would willingly perswade, that the souls (yea, even of just men) were in his power; yet so farr is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as S. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that Book before cited) might rightly tearm it a detestable opinion so to think. For, if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him, either by Dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were sottish to conceive, that he would permit the Devil, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Saul's respect; it being also contrary to his divine Law, to ask counsel of the dead; as in Deut. 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the Soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

1 King. 17. 22. 2 King. 4. 34.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Devils which Saint Augustine calleth Ludificatores animantium sibi subjectorum; Mockers of their own vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their ears, like the voices of men, do also perswade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselves both possess, and have power over, the souls of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium saith L. Vives; The Devil beguileth the sence both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devil's power, whom, if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For, when he is not the instrument of God's vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary vassal: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine; He can allure, but he cannot enforce to evil. Such as think otherwise, may go into the number remembred by Lucretius:

Nullus enim magus aut dæmon mortuum vere unquam excitavit vivum de fascin.

Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atque omnia cæcis
In tenebris metuunt: sic nos in luce timemus.

We fear by light, as children in the dark.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis, and of other her Acts.

SECT. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUT to come back to Ninus, the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the City it self, it is agreed by all profane Writers, and by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth, as three Chariots might pass on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no less admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plains of Assyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as antient Historians report, and more lately, Nauclerus) had the name of Campsor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldæa, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed, in the first Age, when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring ing to build Towns and Villages, for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bush-ments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth: and purposing to follow the Conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

SECT. II.

Of the end of Ninus; and the beginning of Semiramis Reign.

THis she did after the death of her husband Ninus; who, after he had mastered Bactria, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellespont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Ninive; he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 25. years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute soveraign power for one day. Diod. Siculus, out of Athenæus, and others, speaks of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of Rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her, after his death, the sole Rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylon in Chaldæa, to Ninive in Assyria. Justine reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in person of her Son Ninias, or Zameis, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

Ælian. lib. 7. ex Dino.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her Son Ninias had such a stature at his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the Empire from him 42. years after by any such subtilty (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true, that Ninus, or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

SECT. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage and Education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base Parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis Ascalonitis, of Ascalon, the antient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the Daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say, that this Derceta or Darcetis, the mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bank of a Lake adjoyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in love with a goodly young man, she was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme punishment) she conveyed away and caused the same to be hidden among the high Reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild Beasts) the same was fed by certain Birds, which used to feed upon or neer those Waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of Vow; notwithstanding which, she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought, that from this Derceta, the invention of that Idol of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans face, and a Fishes body; into whose Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierom hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a Fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self, I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistims, was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritimate (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

SECT. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her Pedigree, I leave it to Assyrian Heralds; and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazzard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princess more worthy of Fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the Warrs she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report, that she never returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army, there survived but onely twenty persons; the rest, being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famine, or slain by the Sword of Stanrobates. But, as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbred; so were those that returned, less than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four Millions and upwards.

wards. For these numbers, which she levied by her Lieutenant Dercetæus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three Millions; of Horse-men one Million; of Chariots, armed with hooks on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burthen, two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses, three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads, three thousand, by which she might transport over Indus at once, three hundred thousand souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. The incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every Man and Beast but fed on grass) are taken from the Authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes Expedition into Greece and afterwards; whose Army (though the same was farr inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to over-load the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authours consent; that Xerxes transported into Greece, an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellespont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the several Provinces whence those Gallies were taken, hath collected the number.

Suid. f. 8. 45. lit. S.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted, the same being broken, and overthrown by Staurobates, upon the banks of Indus, Canticum cantavit extremum; She sang her last Song; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the Bird of Venus) whence it came, that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Ensigns.

SECT. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis; and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a wall carried foursquare of great heighth and beauty, having on each square, certain brazen Gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the square, she raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Basis of a less circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all, one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldæan Priests made the Observation of the Starrs; because this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower, have many Travellers been deceived, who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple, one hundred thousand talents of Frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nebuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus re-delivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the soil; which Alexander is said to have repaired, by the perswasions of the Chaldæans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldæans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspicuæ undique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius, a careful observer of Rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant une fleche in l' air, a peine pouroit l' envoyer hors de sa base q' elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an arrow from thence into the air, as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham : and the uſe of this Queſtion, for the ordering of the Story of the Aſſyrian Empire.

SECT. I.

Of ſome of the Succeſſors of Semiramis : with a brief tranſition to the Queſtion, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

AFter the death of Semiramis, Ninias, or Zameis, ſucceeded her in the Empire, on whom Beroſus Annianus beſtows the conqueſt of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaſter; contrary to Diodorus, Juſtine, Oroſius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being eſteemed no man of War at all, but altogether feminine, and ſubjected to eaſe and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now, becauſe there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealouſie he every year changed his Provincial Governors, and built Colledges for the Chaldæan Prieſts, his Aſtromers: nor by Arius his ſucceſſor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caſpians, revolted (as it ſeemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the ſucceſſor of Arius; but that he added ſumptuoſity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and ſome Engines for the War: I will, for this preſent, paſs them over, and a while follow Abraham, whoſe ways are warrantable (till we meet theſe Aſſyrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whoſe iſſues, we ſhall beſt give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes, or Balanius. For, otherwiſe, if we ſeek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judg of thoſe times, which the Scriptures ſet us down without errour, by the reigns of the Aſſyrian Princes; we ſhall but patch up the Story at adventure, and leave it in the ſame confuſion in which to this day it hath remained. For, where the Scriptures do not help us, Mirum non eſt in rebus antiquis, Hiſtoriam non conſtare; No marvel if then in things very ancient, Hiſtory want aſſurance. Plutarch in Theſe.

The better therefore to find out, in what Age of the World, and how long theſe Aſſyrian Kings reigned, as alſo for other good cauſes, we muſt firſt aſſure the time of Abraham's Birth, and in what year the ſame happened after the Flood. Now, ſince all agree that the three and fortieth year of Ninus, was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Flood the birth of Abraham happened, we ſhall thereby ſet all the reſt in ſquare and order. But of this time there is much jangling between thoſe Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the moſt part making 292 or 293 years; others 352 years between Abraham's Birth and the Flood: a matter often diſputed, but never concluded.

Archilocus de temporibus (as we find him in Anneus) makes but 250 years from the Flood to Ninus: then ſeeing that Abraham was born in the three and fortyeth year of Ninus, according to Euſebius and Saint Auguſtine, it followeth, by the addition of thoſe two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth was in the year after the Flood 293; or, as the moſt part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, ſince I do here enter into that never reſolved Queſtion, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give Reaſon for my own Opinion: and with ſo much the greater care and circumſpection, becauſe I walk aſide, and in a way apart from the multitude: yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather chooſe to endure the wounds of thoſe darts, which Envy caſteth at Novelty, than to go on ſafely and ſleepily in the eaſie ways of ancient miſtakings: ſeeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

SECT. II.

A Proposal of Reasons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292 after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

THose who seek to prove this account of 292 years, between the general Flood and Abraham's Birth, ground themselves, first, on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: Secondly, upon the Opinion of Josephus, Saint Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are slightly looked over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the later Chronologers gather these Arguments. First, out out of the words as they lie; That Terah at 70 years begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the Son of the Promise, ought in this respect to be counted the eldest Son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, ~~who was heir of the Blessing~~; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter, was to set down the Genealogie of Christ from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130th year of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132, &c. Moses having no where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130 years: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100 years.

SECT. III.

The Answer to the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Father's death.

TO answer all which Objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will add somewhat of mine own, according to the small Talent which God hath given me. Now, for as much as the state of the Question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these Arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travels, that serveth as a ground for this Opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the later after his Father's death, the former presently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his Father's death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. Heb. 11.8. This Supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the Supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran, after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of Saint Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Acts 7.4. Against which place, so direct and plain, what force hath any Man's fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability or reason to induce it? For, if any man out of this place before alledged can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan; and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But, that he performed the Commandment of God after his Father's death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledg of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For, if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself, and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed, we shall find small reason to make us think, that Abraham passed and re-passed those ways, more often then he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisom journey, than the strength of his Faith in Gods Promises: In which, if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to flie into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise: And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice; all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent. Heb. 11.8.

Secondly, let us consider the ways themselves which Abraham had to pass over; the length whereof was 300 English miles; and through Countreys of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300 miles in length, let every reasonable man judg. For, if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all, 1800 miles from Ur to Haran; and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove prove this fancy; the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more proof (that he had not animum revertendi, not any thought of looking backward) than any man's bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written

Gen. 12. 7. of him, Then Abraham took Sarah his wife, and Lot his brother's Son, and all their substance that they possest, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now, if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his Wife and Kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Countrey as that was: or, if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely, that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his Father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a mere stranger, both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his Father's death: so they, perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage, their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his Father's death, or some time after, being then, by their account, 135 years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four or five
Gen. 24. years after that time, his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn oath his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely, if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgment, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only Son, who was then five and thirty years old; before which age, most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten children; rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any, in that Countrey. But, let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat happened,
Gen. 24. 35, 36, &c. which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abraham's man, in doing his Masters errand, was fain to lay open the whole Story of his Master's prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a Son in her old age, if Abraham himself, a more certain Author, had so lately been among them? would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable; considering how averse he was from permitting his Son to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his
Gen. 24. 6. & 8. own kindred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither
Gen. 28. by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own Linage; not without God's especial approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally, was driven to convey himself from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written Examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered; we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the Posterity of the Hebrews. When Hezekiah was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seems that he conceived great 2 King. 20. pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the Prophesy which thereupon he heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsel of God was not agreeable to such thoughts; which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the Waters of Babylon they sate down and Psal. 137. wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sesac and 1 King. 14. Neco, Kings of Egypt, brought calamity upon Israel: 25. and also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours 2 King. 23. was the cause of their destruction. Where they were v. 29. forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy, Deut. 17. that God had said, They should no more return that way; v. 16. which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But, because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of judgment or understanding: I I take it sufficient, that St. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are precisely set down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur, or Camerina in Chaldæa to Haran, or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Father's death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattel were more then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence, having pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa under Abimelec: and after, near unto it at Bersabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Isaac on the mountain Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran, or Charran, appeareth not in any one Story, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita his Cabala hath feigned, it should in reason, therewithall be believed, that he would in those his first travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time with his Wife, Kinsmen, Family, Goods, and Cattel, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, passed through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and Gen. 12. 6. the plain of Moriah; where, finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out ſome fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Geneſis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journying towards the South: and always unſetled. By reaſon of which wandring to and fro, ſome ſay, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebræi.

Mont. in Cald.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the Countrey, we may note, that ere he came into Bethel and Hai, and at his firſt entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, ſaying, Unto thy ſeed will I give this Land, ſhewing it him, as unto a ſtranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For, Abraham, without any other provident care for himſelf, believed in the Word of the living God: neither ſending before, nor coming firſt to diſcover it; but being arrived, he received a ſecond Promiſe from God, that he would give thoſe Countries unto him and his ſeed to inhabit and inherit.

Laſtly, what ſhould move any Man to think, that Moſes would have omitted any ſuch double journey of Abraham's, ſeeing he ſetteth down all his paſſages elſewhere, long and ſhort? as when he moved from Sichem, and ſeated between Hai and Bethel, the diſtance being but 20 miles: and when he moved thence to the Valley of Mamre, being 24 miles; and when he left Mamre, and ſet down at Gerar, being leſs than ſix miles; No, Moſes paſt over all the times of the firſt Age with the greater brevity, to haſten him to the Story of Abraham: ſhutting up all between the Creation and the Flood in ſix Chapters; which Age laſted 1656 years: but he beſtoweth on the Story of Abraham, fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175 years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moſes forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions; or that he would ſet down thoſe ſmall removes of five miles, and omit thoſe of three hundred. For ſuch a journey in going and coming would have miniſtred ſome variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inſerting and adding to Abraham's Story.

SECT. IV.

The Anſwer to another of the Objections propoſed, ſhewing, that it was not unlikely that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

NOw, touching the Objection, where it is ſaid, that it was very unlikely that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year, ſeeing Abraham himſelf thought it a wonder to have a Son at a hundred; this is hardly worth the anſwering. This wonder is indeed miſ-caſt, and miſ-taken: Abraham having reſpect only to Sarah his Wife, when he ſpake of their many years. For, when the Angel ſaid unto Abraham in his Tent door at Mamre, Loe, Sarah thy Wife ſhall have a Son, it followeth in the next Verſe, Now Abraham and Sarah were old, and ſtricken in age, and it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is ſaid, it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of Women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his ſecond Wife Keturah, had many Sons after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Jockshan, Medan, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldeſt of theſe was born 37 years after Iſaac; and the youngeſt 40 years after. What ſtrangeneſs then, that Terah, being 130 years old, ſhould beget Abraham, will they ſay, may be gathered from this ſuppoſed deſpair of Abraham at 100 years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145, and Iſaac was born in the year 2109, and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109 out of 2145, there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5 Sons 36 years after this ſuppoſed wonder, and when Abraham was 137 years old; it is not ſtrange, that his Father Terah ſhould beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Jeſſe, who lived ſo many years and Ages after Abraham, begat Sons at 100 years, or neer it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130, and Abraham others at the ſame age, and ſeven years after.

SECT. V.

The Anſwer to two more of the Objections, ſhewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldeſt Son; and that there was great cauſe, why in the Story of Abraham his two Brethren ſhould be reſpected.

IT follows now, to ſpeak ſomething to the Objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldeſt Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all ſucceeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledg.

But this Propoſition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham his age, unleſs we make him the eldeſt Son, is falſe. For it is plain in the Scripture, that when Terah was 205, which was the year of his death; then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judg of times, either preceeding or ſucceeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I anſwer, That St. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his Father Terah; and Terah died at 205; ſo as the 75th year of Abraham was the 205th year of Terah; which known, there can be no errour in the account of times ſucceeding. Now, to come to the Objection, where it is ſaid, That Moſes had no reſpect unto Nahor and Haran, becauſe they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God eſtabliſhed the Covenant, and of whom Chriſt deſcended according to the the fleſh, &c. I anſwer, That Moſes, for many great and neceſſary cauſes had reſpect of Nahor and Haran. For the ſucceſſion of God's Church is not witneſſed by Abraham alone, but by the iſſues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters, or otherwiſe. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, and Bethuel of Rebeka, the Mother of Iſrael; and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; and Sarah was Mother to Iſaac, and Grandmother to Jacob: Milcah alſo, the Wife of Nahor, and Mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great Grandmother; and the age of Sarah, the Daughter of Haran, is eſpecially noted, in that it pleaſed God to give her a Son at 90 years, and when by nature ſhe could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themſelves, yet, becauſe both Nahor and Abraham married the Daughters of their brother Haran; and becauſe Iſaac married Rebeka the grand-child of Nahor; and Jacob Lea and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the grand-child alſo of Nahor; it was not ſuperfluous in Moſes to give light of thoſe mens times and ages. And though ſometime they worſhipped ſtrange gods, as it is, Joſ. 24. 2. yet I ſee no cauſe to think, that they ſtill continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural Countrey and City of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the ſiſter of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor alſo, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons Daughters to Iſaac, and Jacob, his own kinſmen: he himſelf having alſo married in his own Family; not thinking it pleaſing unto God, to mix themſelves with Strangers and Idolaters. And that theſe men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For, when Laban had ſeen the ſervant of Abraham ſtanding at the Well beſide Charran, he invited him to his Fathers houſe in this manner, Come in, thou bleſſed of Jehovah, &c. And when this ſervant of Abraham's demanded an anſwer as touching Rebekah, then anſwered Laban and Bethuel, and ſaid, This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning, that it was the Will of the true God it ſhould be ſo; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewiſe in the following verſe, it is written; Take, go, that ſhe may be thy Maſters Sons Wife, even as Jehovah hath ſaid. This their often uſing of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a ſign that they had the knowledg of him.

Moſes

Gen. 24. 31.

Gen. 24. 50.

Now, although it be the opinion of Chryſoſtom, and ſome late Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaſter, Muſculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, becauſe he retained certain Idols, or Houſhold-gods, which Rachel ſtole from him; yet, that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abraham's ſervant, bleſſed of Jehovah, as aforeſaid. So as, for my ſelf, I dare not avow that theſe men were out of the Church, who, ſure I am, were not out of the Faith.

SECT. VI.

That the naming of Abraham firſt of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldeſt; together with divers reaſons, proving that Abraham was not the eldeſt Son of Terah.

TO the main Objection; which I anſwer laſt, becauſe it ſeemeth of moſt ſtrength, by which, thoſe that ſtrive to ſhorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldeſt Son of Terah, and born in the 70 year of Terah's life; grounding themſelves firſt and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived ſeventy years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I ſay, that although Abraham in this verſe be firſt named, yet the ſame is no proof at all that he was the eldeſt and firſt-born Son of Terah. For it is no neceſſary conſequent, that the firſt named in Scriptures was therefore eldeſt in bloud and birth; neither doth in appear, that it pleaſed God to make eſpecial choice of the firſt Sons in nature and time: for Seth was not the firſt-born of Adam; nor Iſaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Iſaac; nor Judah and Joſeph of Jacob; nor David the eldeſt of Jeſſe; nor Solomon of David; as it is formerly remembred.

Gen. 11. 26.

But it is written of Noah; Noah was 500 years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: ſhewing, that at the 500 year of his age he began to beget the firſt of thoſe three Sons. For, according to St. Auguſtine, ſpeaking generally, Nec attendendus eſt in his ordo nativitatis, ſed ſignificatio futuræ dignitatis; in qua excelluit Abraham: The order of Nativity is not here to be reſpected, but the ſignification of the future dignity; in which Araham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the Sons of Noah, ſo is it here; where it is ſaid, That Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himſelf being begotten by his Father Nahor at 29, as other his Anceſtors were at 30. The like alſo happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 133, Enoſh Kenan at 90, Kenan Mahalaleel at 70, Mahalaleel Jarad at 60; Noah was yet 500 years old when he began to beget the firſt of his three Sons, as aforeſaid. And Saint Auguſtine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the Opinion, that Abraham was the youngeſt of Terah's Sons, than otherwiſe, though for his excellency he was worthily named firſt; his own words are theſe: Fieri enim ut potuit poſterior ſit generatus Abraham; ſed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus: It might be, ſaith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was firſt named, in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming firſt or laſt, proveth nothing who was firſt or laſt born; either in thoſe iſſues of Noah, or in theſe of Terah. Neither hath God any reſpect of the eldeſt in nature, as touching his election or ſpiritual bleſſing; for Moſes nameth firſt the Children of the promiſe, and the eldeſt and firſt in Gods favour. Pietas ergo, vel ipſa potius electio divina, quæ comitem ſecum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, ſaith he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it, Piety, and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Sem among the Children of Noah, and to Abraham among thoſe of Thare.

Aug. queſt. ſuper Gen. 25.

For the reſt, it is manifeſt, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75 year of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Iſhmael, when Abraham had lived 86 years. It was at Gerer (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Iſaac, when Abraham had conſumed 100 years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham roſe out, when he reſcued Lot, and overthrew Amraphel; and he had then but the age of 83 years: and it is as manifeſt, that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But, if Terah begat Abraham at 70 years old, then muſt Abraham have been 135 years when he firſt ſet his foot in Canaan, ſeeing Terah muſt be dead ere he parted, and ſo 70 added to 135, make 205, the true age of Terah; which is contrary to all thoſe places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75, he reſcued Lot at 83, he had Iſmael at 86, he had Iſaac at 100, proved by the former places.

Gen. 12. 4.

Gen. 16. 16.

Acts 7. 4.

Gen. 14.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldeſt Son of Terah, and born in the 70 year of his age: then had Terah lived till Iſaac had been 35 years old, and Iſhmael 49; both which muſt then have been born in Meſopotamia, and therein foſtered to that age: unleſs we ſhould either deny credit to St. Stephen, who ſaith that Abraham departed from Meſopotamia after his Fathers death, or elſe believe the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Cronologia antoptica, ſaith, it was about his Fathers death, becauſe the Greek word μετὰ may be tranſlated by the Latin ſub, as well as by poſt: which, though elſewhere it may be, yet cannot be ſo in this place. For it were moſt improperly ſpoken, to ſay, that that those things were done about Terah's death, which were sixty years before. Wherefore, supposing Abraham to have been born in the seventieth year of Terah; we must give those times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no Authority will warrant; For Abraham had no Children in Ur of Chaldæa, nor in Haran, nor in ten years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's Death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World 2083; and the year of Ishmael's Birth was the World's year 2094; which maketh ten years difference. And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the Mountain Moriah therein, thirty nine miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appear'd to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be, that any of Abraham's Sons were born in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah lived; nor in less than ten years after Terah's Death; and then consequeutly was not Abraham the eldest Son of Terah, nor born in the seventieth year of Terah's Age. Gen. 12.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75; if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah lived but 145: for 70 and 75 make 145, which must also have been the full age of Terah; but Terah lived 205 years, and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70 year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest Brother of Abraham; for Sarah, or Iscah, wanted but ten years of Abraham's age: Isaac being born when Abraham was a hundred, and Sarah ninety years old.

It followeth then, that, if Abraham had been the elder Brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at nine years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within ten years as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And, that Iscah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Iscah of Jishcah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to speak of any thing superfluous, it is not used in God's Book: and if Iscah had not belonged to the Story, it had been but an idle name, to no purpose remembred.

Now, if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moses had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Bethuel and Rebeka, the Mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscah in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name, of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproveth the eldership of Abraham; for Lot was called an old Man, when Abraham was but 83 years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Haran's Daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten years as old as Abraham; it may appear to every reasonable Man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham; who also died first, and before his Father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against this opinion of Abraham's eldership, upon the same place of Genesis; drawing arguments from the age of Sarah, who was but ten years younger than Abraham himself. Lyra his words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit jũnior ipso Abraham, sequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominantur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & ponendus erat caput stirpis, & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ei repromissio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himself, it followeth, that he was not ten years old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last born of the three Sons of Thare, nevertheless he is named first for his dignity, both because he was to be ordained Head of the Stock and Generation following, and because the Promise of Christ was first made unto him, as before it is said of Sem.

SECT. VII.

A Conclusion of this Dispute, noting the Authors on both sides; with an Admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all antient Stories the more unprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130th year of Terah's Life, and not in the 70th year. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to St. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed, when he was 75 years old; these two numbers added, make 205 years, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my self, I have no other end herein, than to manifest the World's Story. I reverence the judgment of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtful, and could not determine this controversie. For, whatsoever is borrowed out of his sixteenth Book de Civitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himself in his five and twentieth Question upon Genesis. But St. Augustine herein followed Josephus and Isidor; and Beda followed St. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first born: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus, together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah; and said, that Abraham was followed with 318 Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim præfectos habuit, quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invaded him with a great Army, took from him his Wife Sarah: Such Fables argue that Josephus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations. Act. 7. 4. Gen. 12. 4.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292 years from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgment in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in setting down the succession of the Persian Kings under whom they lived, whose History was not so far remote in time, as these Antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet grosly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman Religion are also generally on the same side; it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrariwise, of the more antient, Theodoret, and some following him; of later times, Beroaldus, Bucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton, Dr. Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130 year of his father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those nevertheless good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitræus, Functius and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calvisius, proclaiming Beroaldus an arch-heretick in Chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Torniellus, a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whose Annals are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; not alleging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant Writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to Hereticks. For my self, I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this later account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant Writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the best approved Historians, divine, and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the Stories, and fore-past actions of the World; and not the truth of Histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the Story of the Scriptures; teaching the World's new plantation, and the continuance of God's Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292 years, or thereabouts, between the Floud and Birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352 years between the one and the other: the one making Abraham to be the first-born of Thare, in the 70th year of his life; the other a younger Son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130 years. And, if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfie our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable, rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some Editions, make it above 1072 years between the Floud and Abraham's Birth; than to take away any part of those 352 years given. For, if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the World, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we shall find, that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over deeply between Abraham and the Floud: because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole Story might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this Precept of S. Augustine, That whersoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-understood. For, in Abraham's time, all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities; and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India; and those not built with sticks, but of hewn stone, and defended with walls and rampires; which magnificence needed a Parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish brains, who onely bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters, in the Story of the World and Man-kind.

SECT. VIII.

A Computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore, for the reasons before alleged, I conclude, that from the general Floud, to the birth of Abraham, 352 years were consumed; and taking the Assyrian History with us, the same number of years were spent from the Floud to the 43. year of Ninus: in which 43 year of Ninus, Abraham was born; which hapned in the year of the World, 2009. An mundi 2008. dil. 352. natus Abraham, Euf. Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 16. c. 17.

Now, of this time of 352 years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30 years to Chus, ere he begat Seba; of which though the Scriptures are silent, yet, because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first Sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now, after Seba, Chus begat Havilah, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth, Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30 years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered, that 65 years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born; and that Raama had that age before any of his Sons were begotten, it may be gathered by example and comparison: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raama was, begat Reu in the same year of his life. Aug. de Civit. Dei. Gen. 11. 18

Let us then allow 60. years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel; for sure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65 and 60 make 125. The rest of the time of 131 (in which year they arrived in Shinaar, whereof there are six years remaining) we may give them for their travels from the East; because they were pestered with women, children and cattel: and, as some ancient Writers have conceived, and Berosus of later times, they kept always the mountain sides, for fear of a second floud. Now, if we take this number of 131 out of 352, there remains 221; of which number Berosus bestoweth 65 on Belus, and 42 on Ninus before Abraham born: both which S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221, there remaineth 114 years of the 352, from the Floud to Abraham's birth; which number of 114 necessity bestoweth on Nimrod. An à salute humani generis ab aquis centessimo primo cœpit regnum Babyloniorum sub nostro Saturno patre Jovis Beli, qui imperavit annis 65. Berosus.

And if it be objected, that this time given to Nimrod is overlong; sure, if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather rather appear over short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but 179 years, whereof he reigned 112; whereas Sale, who was the Son of Arphaxad, the Son of Sem, lived 403 years: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the Son of Chus, the Son of Cham.

Now, after Abraham was born,

Ninus reigned 9 years, which added to 43 make 52. Ninus dieth, and leaveth Semiramis his Successour.

Of the World, 2017. Of the Floud, 961. 2059. mundi. 403. à dil. 2083.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylon and Assyria 42 years, and died in the 52 year complete of Abraham's life.

Ninias, or Zameis, succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38 years; in the second year of whose reign Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85 years old, he rescued his Nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprize Amraphel, King of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38 years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23 years after Semiramis died: which was the 75 year of his age; so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninias, the son of Ninus and Semiramis, whose 23 years, as aforesaid, being the 75 year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85 year of Abraham, and the 33 year of his own reign: after which he reigned five years, which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit, for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set down, according to the times noted by Moses in the Story of Abraham, it is most certain; unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impiety, or account the whole History of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemn all ancient Historians for Fablers.

417. 2093. 437.

SECT. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the Son of Ninus.

AND now, touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinaar, or Babylonia, in the 85 year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33 year of the reign of Ninias Zameis the King of the Assyrians, the Son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia, Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias, or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel; who invaded Traconitis, or Basan, and overthrew those five Kings of Pentapolis, or the Valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinaar, which is Babylonia; and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85 year of Abraham's life, wherein he rescu'd Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch; for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first Verse of the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel; as it is written, Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him; and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia. Now, Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphel's Countrey; and the other two Kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinaar, or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large Dominion. For, had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis, whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three or four Kings for this Expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings (as it is manifest that he was: For these little Kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be that the great and potent Empire of Assyria had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall at the time of this War: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phœnician Sea; to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Gen. 14. 4.

SECT. X.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlosyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOw the two other Kings joyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Hierom write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellespont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellespont far distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa; which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certain that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as Commanders; but used all the Art they had to invite Crœsus to their assistance; perswading him, that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprize, what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made War with Bera, King of Sodom, Birsha King of Gomorrah, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela, which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex; being such a kind of Reguli, as Josua found in the Land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoyning; of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Josua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power; and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus, or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotence and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

Xenophon.

Gen. 14.

And though it be alleged for an Example, that divers Kings far off came to assist Pompey against Cæsar; yet these same examples, without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes no less doubtful than fearful: But the whole Country by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; a narrow Valley of ground, lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Seir; inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North; consisting of two small Provinces of Traconitis, or Basan, and the Region of the Moabites; a conquest far unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Vulgar, and Aquila, convert Ellassar by Pontus: So Symmachus makes Arioch, a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as far fetched to join with the Assyrians in this Warr, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellassor at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the Mountains whereof the Ark did rest; so do they in this place retain the word Ellassor, being doubtful to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himself remembreth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latine translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Grecian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cœlosyria; and St. Hierom calleth Ellas the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now, although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cœlosyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King; who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his Conquests, being of the same Family, and descended from Cham and Chus; after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch; and afterward again Aretas; as in the Machabees: the Kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of St. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas, commanding in Damascus. They were Princes, for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel; that in the time of Nebuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings; which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the Son of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus, nor of Scythia, Regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nebuchodonosor, is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans; who are a Nation of Persians, bordering on Assyria, according to Stephanus, though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast and Media: and if any Brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that House (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the Government of that Persian Province, called Elymais (as it seemeth they had, by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nebuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of, may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the Son of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus, whose Sons held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chaldæa; and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own House and Blood; which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

SECT. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

THe fourth King by Abraham overthrown, was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt People; Calvin of Runnagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilæa was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt People: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo; and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And so it may be; but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this Question. For Galilæa was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For, when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not but there are many petty Kingdoms adjoyning to Phœnicia, and Palestina; as Palmyræna, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Calibonitis, and all these do also joyn themselves to Mesopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

SECT. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia; and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

LAstly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrope, Viceroy, or Provincial Governour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named, were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a King of Elam: those Kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria; but never by Elam: and Chedorlaomer, or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither do I believe, that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it self had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself: all whose chief Commanders became Kings after him. Tamberlain conquered Asia and India, with a storm-like, and terrible success: but to prevalent fury, God hath adjoined a short life; and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his Victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus, being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour-Princes, and became victorious over them: a Man violent, insolent and cruel. Simiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious than her Paramour; enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein, with buildings unexampled. But her Son, having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no less feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a successour. For, In Regno Babylonico hic parùm resplenduit; This King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is, that the necks of mortal Men, having been never before galled with the yoak of foreign dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery; no long descent having as yet invested the Assyrian with a right; nor any other title being for him pretended, than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate Son of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his Vassals, with a powerless mastering, and a Mind less industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reign forty two years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to Man's estate; witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred Ease before Honour, and bodily Pleasures before Greatness, as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentious peril enjoy.

These considerations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinaar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion, I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldæa to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700 miles, or little less, with Women, Children, and carriages; the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was the twenty third year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of twenty three years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis Army of four Millions, with her self, utterly consumed in India, and all her Armies and Engins of War at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest Souls and weakest hearted of the World, to repurchase their former liberty.

Strab. l. 15.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and antientest Historians, that Arius the Son of Ninias or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians, and Caspians, and again subjected them: which needed not, if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninus Death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baleus, or Belaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom it is said, that he conquered from Egypt to India; and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & Triumphator, A Conqueror and Triumpher; which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madness, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now, if we shall make any doubt thereof, that is, of the conquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feigned; but if we grant this conquest, then it is true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torn asunder, according to that which had been gathered out of Moses, as before remembred.

SECT. XIII.

That it is not unprobable that the four Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves; and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if so, we need not say, that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all Writers, whose works have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are, or seem intituled; doth almost inforce us to think, that the History must so be understood, as I have delivered. But, if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for People of those Lands; or if (as Hierom hath it) Chedorlaomer was King of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of People, either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions; then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties, which Men, perhaps, have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For, as it had been a strange conjecture to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian against the Sodomite, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation, it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should pass through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his Ear, being disjoyned by so man great Nations of different Languages, a wise Man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea, the Kingdom of Ellasar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependences; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrah? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great City Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now, as these doubts, which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea, and more, as being grounded upon the Text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that that ſmall Province, or rebel againſt ſo powerful a Monarch? Or if it were ſo, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he ſhould come or ſend to reclaim them; was it not more than madneſs in them, when his terrible Army approached, ſtill to entertain hope of evaſion; yea, to make reſiſtance (being themſelves a diſſolute, and therefore unwarlike people) againſt the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea, between themſelves and the River Indus? Likewiſe, on the part of Chedorlaomer, we ſhould find no great wiſdom, if he, knowing the weakneſs of this People, had raiſed ſuch a World of Men againſt them: whom by any Leivetenant, with ſmall forces he might have ſubdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Countrey, was not ſufficient to countervail one Month's charges of ſo huge an Army. How ſmall then muſt his valour have been, who with ſo mighty preparations effected no more than the waſting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities ſtanding, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few Priſoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although he had broken their Army in the Field? Now, the Scriptures do not of this invaſion (ſuppoſed ſo great) make any fearful matter; but compoſe the two Armies as equally matcht, ſaying, they were four Kings againſt five; yea, if

Gen. 14.17. the place be literally expounded, we ſhall find that Abraham ſlew all theſe Kings; of which great ſlaughter no Hiſtory makes mention: Neither will the reign of Ninias, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he ſhould have died ſo ſoon; neither would Hiſtories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had ſo ſtrangely periſhed in Syria. Whereby it appears, that theſe four Kings were not the ſame that they are commonly thought; nor their forces ſo great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that theſe Kings were ſuch as many others, who in that age carried the ſame Title; Lords and Commanders every one of his own Company, which he carried forth as a Colony, ſeeking place where to ſettle himſelf and them, as was the uſual manner of thoſe times, Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troup of Perſians, Amraphel ſome people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of ſundry places, might conſort together, and make the weakeſt of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whoſoever will conſider the beginning of the firſt Book of Thucydides, with the manner of Diſcoveries, Conqueſts and Plantations in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almoſt as many Kings as ſeveral Armies; or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new diſcoveries, paſſages, and conqueſts in the Weſt-Indies; may eaſily perceive, that it was neither unuſual for the Leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted; nor to make alliances together, and break them again, diſturbing ſometimes one the other, ſometimes helping in purſuit of a conqueſt. That Amraphel and his aſſociates were ſuch manner of Commanders, it may ſeem the more likely, by the ſlothful quality of Ninias then reigning in Aſſyria; whoſe unmanlike temper was ſuch, as might well give occaſion to ſuch undertaking Spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accuſtomed in the Reign of Semiramis, rather to ſeek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilſt others, more unworthy than themſelves, were advanced. If the conſent of the whole ſtream of Writers upon this place, make this conjecture diſagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reaſon muſt ſubſcribe, then we may hold our ſelves to the former conjecture, Amraphel was Ninias; and that the power of his Anceſtors being by his ſloth decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Perſian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not ſatisfie, we may ſay that Amraphel was an under-King, or Satrapa of Shinaar, under Ninias; who may be ſuppoſed to have had his Imperial Seat in his Father's City, Nineve; and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the City of his Mother, whom he hated as an Uſurper of his right. But, if it were poſſible that in a caſe not concerning any Man's Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might err; then can I think that the opinion, that thoſe four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, ſent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themſelves, is moſt conſonant, both to the condition of thoſe times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add, that Chedorlaomer ſeems rather called a Perſian King, than King of Perſia: And that Arioch (whoſe Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a Man of Action, or being a worthy Man's Son, was very well pleaſed to give paſſage and aſſiſtance to theſe Captains or petty Kings. Theſe, and ſuch like things here to urge, were but with circumſtances to adorn a ſuppoſition, which either may ſtand without them, or if it muſt fall, is unworthy to have coſt beſtowed upon it; eſpecially conſidering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Reader's pleaſure, to follow any of theſe opinions, or any other, if he find any that ſhall ſeem better than theſe. But of what countries or people ſoever theſe four were Kings, this Expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to this Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews, Eſau, and Jacob, as they are regiſtred by Moſes, becauſe it is not our purpoſe, either to ſtand upon things generally known to all Chriſtians, nor to repeat what hath been elſewhere already ſpoken, nor to prevent our ſelves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we paſs them here in ſilence. And becauſe in the Story of Abraham and his Poſterity, there is much mention of Egypt, by which it appears, that even in the time of Abraham, it was a ſettled and flouriſhing Kingdom; it will not be amiſs in the next place to ſpeak ſomewhat of the Antiquities and firſt Kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first Peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

SECT. I.

A Brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt; with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

SOon after the confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham, with many of his issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the Floud) came thither and took possession of the Countrey; in which they built many Cities; and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The antient Governours of this Kingdom, till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewn in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.

The Table, and especially the Chronology, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For S. Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgment, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all Antiquities, and had read the Books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings, which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests; who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted unto strangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent Works, and royal Buildings in Egypt, such as are never found but in States that have greatly flourished, witness that their Princes were of marvelous greatness, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own names such as pleased them best, have confirmed them, and as it were inforced them upon us by their Authority. A third and general cause of more than Egyptian darkness in all antient Histories, is the Edition of many Authors, by John Annius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very Learned I may add mine) I think thus; that Annius having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved Writes confirm him; but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass, that the account of Authors, either in the Chronology or Genealogy of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian Writers, such as are antient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Annius his Authors; The profane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

SECT. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the Floud, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the antient Kings about whom is most controversie, the best mean is by help of the Dynasties; of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16th Dynastie is joyned by general consent with the 43 year of Ninus, in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve which were call'd the greater gods: so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The 13th Dynastie endured 14 years; the fourteenth 26, the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161 years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dynasties, was such as hath been mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this onely reason, that Annius hath it so; considering, that both hitherto, it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid, the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161 years, which, according to our account, were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352 years, which were between the Floud and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Cham's reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear: For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of man-kind which came into Shinaar, arrived at Babel, Anno à Diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed 40 years, as Glycas recordeth; whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattel, and Substance through all Syria, then desolate, and full of Boggs, Forests and Bryers (which the Deluge, and want of culture, in one hundred seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow twenty years; and these sums being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one years after the Floud, before they arrive at Babel, fourty years for their stay there, and twenty for Cham's passage into Egypt, and settling there, make up the sum of 191 years; at which time we find that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this sum of 191 years, if we add the 161 years of the 15 first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole sum of their several times above 161 years; Let it suffice, that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the Floud, or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinks) must have been before the Floud. That the arrival at Babel was many years before the plantation of Egypt after the Floud, enough hath been said to prove; and that the Dynasties were not before the Floud, the number of the long-liv'd Generations between Adam and the Floud, which was less than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or, if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have been as well after the Floud, as before; considering that the Sons of Noah did not in every Countrey erect such form of Policy, as had been used in the same ere the Deluge; but such as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conductor, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

SECT. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

THe short continuance of the Dynasties doth shew that they were not several races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted: For in restitutions of decayed Antiquities, it is more easie to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of some trusty Counsellor, onely reserving the Soveraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turk doth to the chief Visier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris, or Misraim; and must therefore have been successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philistim, in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, Captain of his Host; though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech, the Son of Gideon, it was said: Is not he the Son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer. Also Ishbosheth, the Son of Saul, feared Abner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite, living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely, both by his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of the Government upon others; and upon jealousie, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph; Onely in the King's Throne will I be above thee: behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like, or very same form of Government by Viceroys, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrey, however they have been so deem'd; but that they acknowledg'd and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliph; who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of Civil Government, but the power of making War and Peace, with the whole Office and Authority Royal, into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliph, or Meulene Edhadech, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the Image of the antient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferiour in Wisdom.

Will. Tyr. de bell. Sacro. l. 19. c. 17, 18, 19, & 20.

Lib. 19. c. 22.

To think that many names of such Regents, or Lieutenants, as Joseph was, have crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Country; besides, it is not unlikely, that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men and strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himself, intending his quiet, had given his Office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus; each of whom, citing their relations, as good Authority, say; Diodorus, and Sesostris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332 after Menas; which could not have been, if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many Races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Linages or sorts of men. Now, by whatsoever means a Dynastie, or Regencie continued; whether in one Family, as being made an hereditary Office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is, that was the King's gift and free choice, that gave the Office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election; which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby, either have been inthralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next ſucceſſor: or enjoying their father's Land, though not his Eſtate, have been more mighty than the King: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himſelf their Tenant. Likewiſe we find in Exod. 12. that God ſmote the firſt-born of Pharaoh, that was to ſit on his Throne. And in Eſay, it is ſaid of Pharaoh, I am the Son of the antient King. Eſa. 19.

SECT. IV.

Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Oſiris.

THat the ſucceſſion of Kings began, and continued in ſuch wiſe as the Table hath ſhewed from Cham to Chenares, now it followeth to ſhew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, becauſe the Poſterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himſelf did firſt plant it, we may gather by many circumſtances. For I think it is no-where found, that the Countries of Chuſh, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Oſiris calleth himſelf the eldeſt Son of Cham, ſaying, Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: alſo, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoſo ortum; which muſt needs be underſtood of Cham; for this Saturnus Egyptius was Cham: as it is ſaid, that on the Monument of Ninus was an Inſcription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Egyptius. Likewiſe the Temple of Hammon, not far from Egypt, doth teſtifie, that Ham reſided in thoſe parts: And S. Hierom, in queſtionibus Hebraicis, ſaith, that the Egyptians themſelves did in his days, call their Country Ham; as in four ſeveral places in the Pſalms this Countrey is called the Land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Oſiride, that in the ſacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrey of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, ut puto (ſaith he) à Chamo Noes filio, to which alſo he addeth out of Iſidore, Ægyptum uſque hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari; that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the ſame reaſons may ſuffice to be alleged, which I have already given in proof of the time ſpent in the 15 firſt Dynaſties: Neither is it ſhange, that the reign of Cham ſhould laſt ſo long as 161 years; conſidering that Sem lived 600, Arphaxſhad and Shelah each above 400. But ſtrange it had been, if one Salis created by Manetho, had in thoſe long-lived generations reigned there 19 years, and with Baon, Apachnas, Apochis and others of the ſame brood, obſcured the fame and glory of Oſiris, Orus and Seſoſtris. Reineccius in Hiſt. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwiſe called Oſiris, according to Diodorus; who, ſaith he, was the Son of Hammon: Krentzhemius ſaith, that Mizraim and Oſiris, are words of near affinity and ſound in the Hebrew tongue. Howſoever it be, we know that Mizraim the Son of Cham, was Lord of Egypt; and Reineccius, citing good authority in this caſe, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language, Mezre. Neither do I ſee cauſe of doubt whether Oſiris were the ſame with Mizraim. It is more neceſſary, and hard to ſhew manifeſtly, how long Mizraim, or Oſiris reigned: For whereas the year of his death is no where preciſely ſet down, we muſt be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly ſaid by Annius his Beroſus, to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynaſtie of the Thebæi began, it appeareth, firſt, by the authority of Euſebius, who avoucheth as much; next, by Diodorus, who ſaith, that he inhabited Thebes; which habitation of Oſiris there, that it might be cauſe of that Dynaſtie, I can well believe; aſſenting ſo far to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynaſties were named onely according to the ſeveral feats of the Kings. Pſa. 78. 51. 105. 23, 27. 106. 22. *Diod. SECT. V.

Of the time when Oſiris reign ended; and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the Son of Oſiris.

THe death of Oſiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lebabim the Son of Mizraim, called Hercules Lybius, made war in Italy, to revenge his father's death on the aſſociates of Typhon, in the 41 year of Baleus King of Aſſyria; before which year he had made many great Wars in Egypt, Phœnicia, Tygris, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia and Spain; and having ended his Egyptian Wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus far Beroſus, or Authors following Beroſus. That Orus, laſt of all the gods (as they were ſtyled) held the Kingdom of Iſis, Diodorus Siculus plainly ſaith; and Plutarch as much, to which all Hiſtories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon infers, that ſix years may be allowed to the Wars, which Hercules made in ſo many Countries, after the Egyptian Wars were ended: ſo ſhould the death of Oſiris have been the 34 of Baleus, when himſelf had reigned 297 years. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholar than Souldier. For ſurely, in thoſe days, when commerce was not ſuch as now, but all Navigation made by coaſting, a far longer time would have been required, to the ſubduing of ſo many Countries. An allowance of more time, though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent; which was (doubtleſs) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Oſiris had been the 34 of Baleus, then muſt Iſrael have come into Egypt but 7 years before the death of Oſiris; and have lived there in the reign of Typhon: A thing not eaſily believed. For it was the ſame King who advanced Joſeph, bad him ſend for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his father's Funeral; as may eaſily be gathered out of the Book of Geneſis. Whereas therefore the reign of Oſiris cannot be extended by any poſſible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7 year of Iſrael's coming into Egypt, we muſt needs cut off 23 years from that number, which Krentzhemius conjectures his reign to have continued; namely, ſeven which he ſhould have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt; nine, in which Joſeph had there flouriſhed, ere his fathers coming; and other ſeven, in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Oſiris, yet before Joſeph's advancement. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 1. Plut. l. de Iſid. & Oſirid.

Neither will this diſagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his Wars. For the War which Hercules made in Italy, is ſaid to have indured ten years: After which proportion, we may well give not only ſix years, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23 more to ſo many Wars, in ſo many, and ſo far diſtant Countries, as are named before; yea, by this proportion, we may attribute unto Orus the 13 years, which paſſed between the time of Joſeph's being ſold into Egypt, unto his advancement, conſidering that Potiphar, who bought him, and whoſe daughter he may ſeem to have married, continued all that while chief Steward unto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to have been, if ſo violent alterations had hapned the whilſt in Egypt, as the tyrannous uſurpation of Typhon muſt needs have brought brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Potiphar, for his faithfulness to Orus the Son of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reign, made his chief Steward, at which time, buying Joseph, and finding him a just Man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Joseph's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesom days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps, I might proceed further, and say, That when the saying of Joseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his servants; then Potiphar, Priest of On, being chief Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledg in Joseph, the antient graces of God, and his injurious imprisonment: whereupon he gave him his Daughter to Wife; and being old, resigned his Office of chief Steward unto him, who afterward, in regard of Potiphar, did favour the Priests, when he bought the Lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike the Friarly book of Asenath, Potiphar's Daughter: but, unto such as consider God works usually by means; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died, it would seem a matter more probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the Wars of Hercules, in which, by this reckoning, he should have spent forty two years after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian Wars considered, and his former enterprises and atchievments proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us; or, if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the indisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless, I freely grant, that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well-agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

SECT. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim; and of divers Errors about the former Sesostres.

CONcerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proof, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alledging no witness, but as it were, saying, Teste me ipso; yet herein we may think him to speak probably, for as much as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his Fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his Brother, he followed other Wars in the same quarrel, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon; yet, seeing Aventinus, a follower of Berosus, hath it so, I will also believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, seven years were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzhemius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven years after the death of Osiris; forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable, I think he wanted not. Now, whereas he alloweth ninety years of the eighteen Dinastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus; it seems that the reign of Orus lasted a hundred and fifteen years. From the death of Orus, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed a hundred twenty two years by our account; who (according to Beroaldus and others) think that Abraham was born in the hundred and thirtieth year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus: From the end of the Flood to the Birth of Abraham 352

From that vocation of Abraham time to the departure out of Egypt 75 430

which Sum divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforesaid) only a hundred twenty two years from the death of Orus, we are now to consider, how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesostris, or Sesonchosis, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonii; not without good probability. For this great King or Conqueror, is by many Historics recorded to have over-run a great part of Asia; to have built a Fleet of Ships on the Red-Sea, and so to have entred into India; like wise with another Fleet on the middle-Earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justine, erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris; For Justine placeth Vexoris in Ages before Ninus; whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if he were Vexoris, was more antient then was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the Land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father-in-law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gezar, and gave it to his Daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time, Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the Land of Israel, when he made his Expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres, and Necho, it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostris. Of Sesac, it is doubted by some, for as much as he came into Judea with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unless it be sufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himself placeth Sesostris next to Orus, following the Scoliastes Apollonii. But further answer may be made, to shew that they were not one. For, as Justine witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Vexoris, made War on people far removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came up purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000 Horse, Sesac had 60000. Sesostris had 8020 Chariots, Sesac 1200. Sesostris made his Expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign; whom he had favoured even against Solomon: therefore Sesostris must needs have reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemeus collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus; because those Historians affirm that he reigned next after the Gods; it moveth me nothing. For Osiris did succeed those fifteen Gods; namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser; himself also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menæus, and Menis, were titles of Dignity; though mistaken by some, as proper names, Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercurius Ter-maximus, the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician; which name Ter-maximus might might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conqueror, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great undertakings, Sesostris was no whit inferiour to Osiris: For he sought Victory not for Gain, but Honour only; and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royal disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great Treason, the House in which he was, being by his own Brother purposely Fired; which nevertheless, he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty years; after which time, he chose rather to die than to live, because he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Sesostris left a Son, whose name was Pheron, or Pherones; who afterwards took the name of Sesostris, but was nothing like to his Father in Glory; for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness, Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a Javelin; which tale Diodorus having like wise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying, that perhaps he took the disease naturally from his Father. How long this Man reigned, it is no where expressed; yet, for as much as Orus the second (otherwise Busiris) who succeeded him, began fourteen years after this Sesostris had been King, it must needs be that this reigned fourteen years at least. That Busiris began not until these fourteen years at least were expired, the very account of time from the first Busiris to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been seventy five years. That none came between Sesostris the second, and Busiris, or Orus the second, it stands only upon probabilities, which are these: After Sesostris had reigned some while he fell blind; after certain years, he recovered his sight, as is said, which may have been true, but is more like to have been a Fable; surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set down, is very fabulous; namely, that by looking upon a Woman, or washing his Eyes with her Water, who had only known her own Husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his reign before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of fourteen years; so his works, which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus and Diodorus; a part of which may seem to have been the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the Chanels and Sluces of Nilus; whom, I think, he rather frighted (as his Father had done) with Spades and Shovels, than with Darts and Javelins; and by his diligent over-sight of that work, was like enough to lose both his Eye-sight and his Peoples love; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

Of Busiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successour Queen Thermutis, that took up Moses out of the Water.

And herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Busiris, who was afterwards King, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the Son of Solomon. For that Busiris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the Children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesostris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the King by industry; and afterward with the People, by incensing them against their new King, as Jerobobum did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers; unless he have either an equal Spirit, or a surer Foundation. If moreover he sought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did that to his own People which was very plausible; who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now, that Orus the second, or Busiris, was the King that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew Children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten Months; it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers; who also think that hereupon grew the Fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Joseph, was a King of a new Family. That Busiris was of a new Family, Relneccius doth shew; who also thinks him an Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all Mens computation, began his reign five years after the Birth of Moses; before whose Birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more, that the persecution began; which Bunting thinks to have lasted eighty seven years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-roys in Egypt was; and how great confidence the King did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for Bread; giving at the same time the best of the Land to his own Father and Brethren for nothing; seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for Bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph, what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetcht out of Prison, a King well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and soveraign Authority: it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a Man of especial Reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked Men also, as his instruments against the day of Wrath. Therefore, perhaps, the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to have begun till the Death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did usurp the Kingdom, or protection of the Land by violence; or whether the Blind King resigned it, keeping the Title; or whether Busiris were only Regent whilst the King lived, and afterwards (as it is acknowledged by all) King himself; it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and shortly after, King in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind King Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: But, for as much as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil nature, even when he first arose; I think it more likely, that Busiris did it, using at first the Power of a King, and shortly after the Stile. Thus of the 122 years which passed between the beginning of Sesostris his Reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, forty seven being spent, the seventy five which remain, are to be accounted to Busiris, or Orus the second, and his Children. Busiris himself reigned thirty years, according to Eusebius; whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his Daughter, Daughter, who took Moses out of the Water, is said, by all that I have read, to have reigned twelve years. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Muthis, according to Cedrenus: Eusebius calls her Acencris; and out of Artabanus his History, Meris: Joseph calls her both Acenchre, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario, saith, that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the Daughter of Amenoph, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken; for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs Son's Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busiris, or Orus the second, by Eusebius and others; but whether he were a King, or only a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the antient Historians, name the Son of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis; and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Neece or Grandchild, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the Glory of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his Son. If so, and if that Busiris, or Orus the second, marrying her, pretended any Title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was she both Daughter, Grand-child, and Wife unto Pharaoh; and surviving him, Queen of the Land twelve years. But if she was Daughter of Orus the second, and Sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her Brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule when her Father died.

SECT. VIII.

Of the two Brethren of Queen Thermutis; and what King it was, under whom Moses was born; and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

SHe had two Brethren; the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius; but his linage and off-spring described by Reinaccius. Rathoris, after his Sisters Death, reigned nine years; after whom Chencres, thought to be his Son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io; of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acenchres, but all, or most do stile Θόμαχον, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned eight years; and then Cherres fifteen. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the eleventh year of Cherres, it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely; viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea; else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres, the Grand-child of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned four years after Cherres; and Armesis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others, accounted as one, and his Reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danaus; and his Pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Histor. Julia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes, who gave name to the Country, having expell'd his Brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.	Danaus, or Armeus, expelled by his Brother Ægyptus, after he had reigned five years, became King of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to pass, that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say; considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius, to have been born in the time of Chencres. But for as much as the History of Epaphus his Birth, is diversly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the Father of Danaus and Ægyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Busiris, or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grand-child of Chencres. And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two Brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus; of whom the former had fifty Daughters, the latter fifty Sons; perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers Women: yet surely they began to beget Children in their first Youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armeus, or Danaus, did succeed Cherres; and (according to Eusebius, and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68 years. This Rameſſes, or Ægyptus, is that Armeſeſmiamum, or Armeſesmianus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born; and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew Children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For, whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the fortieth year of his age; and fled into the Wilderness, and there abode for fear: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes who reigned so long; wherefore, desirous rather to hold a true Parodox, than a common Errour, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the List of Egyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an Age 112 or 113 years, more antient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his Successours from Themosis (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each Man's reign than is the difference between Manetho and Eusebius; he finds Moses born under Armeſeſmiamum, and Israel delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharaates, of which name one was thought to have flourished, either as a King, or as a wise Man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharaates, the change is not great. Mercator was a Man of excellent Learning and Industry; and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable Works: yet my assent herein is with-held from him by these Reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Chencres was King, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. All are dead, &c. may better be understood of Busiris, and all his children, than of one King alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apostate, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120 years old, which was this Armesesmiamum, being then King of Egypt. After Ramesses, Amenophis reigned 19 years; who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea; of which our Opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

CHAP. III.

Of the Delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

SECT. I.

Of the time of Moses Birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

TRue it is, that the History it self is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moses his Birth, who was the excellent and famous Instrument of this, and other great Works of the Highest, the different opinions are very near as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives, in his Annotations upon S. Augustine, cites very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: But, if he did mean the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories, divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, she commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely; neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second Opinion he remembreth out of Appion, taken from Ptolemy, a Priest of Mendes, who saith, that Moses was born while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Amesies in Egypt.

The third Opinion is taken out of Ptolemon, in his Greek History, the first Book; that Moses was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who, though he cite some Authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan War, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more antient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Numinius the Philosopher, who took Museus and Moses to be one; confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Museus by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the Daughter of Egypt; the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus, in his first Book, de Bono. Moses, vir Deo conjunctissimus, is called Museus Judæorum. Eusebius, in his Chronologie, finds that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The antient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses birth, Thuthmosis, or Thmosis: the same, perchance, which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Amosis, and else-where Amenophis, the father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus, and Cornelius Tacitus, gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seems most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus, or Iphereus, governed Assyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criasus the Argives; that then (Sesostris the second, ruling in Egypt) Moses was born. For, if we believe S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrop's time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrop's time, King of 2514. the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved. S. Augustine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was born, Saphrus governing Assyria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrop's time. Now, Saphrus ruled twenty years; his successour Mamelus thirty years; Sparetus after him forty years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to goven in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire one and forty years. So as Moses being born while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia, and Criasus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Assyrian Saphrus; for take one year remaining of twenty (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamelus, and the fourty years of Sparetus, these make seventy one, with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops's fifty years: then take nine years out of the reign of Ascatades, who was Sparetus successor, those nine years added to seventy one, make eighty, at which age Moses left Egypt; and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his fifty, and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming, that towards the end of Cecrops's time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now, the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, and fifty four years, or rather more, after Joseph; between whose death, and the birth of Moses, there were consumed sixty four years, some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For, as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters Exod. 1. over them, to keep them under with burthens; and they built the Cities, Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty, they caused the children of Israel to serve, and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in Clay and Brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power, and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed; even from fifty four years, or not much more, after the death of Joseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370 to 2370. the eightieth year of Moses, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514 towards the end thereof, according 2514.

SECT. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elſewhere in the Scriptures.

THis City, which the Hebrews call Zoan, was built ſeven years after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes, and ſo doth Jeremy; the Septuagint, Tanais; Joſephus, Protaidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegeſippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the Land of Goſen, and is the ſame, wherein Jeremy the Prophet was ſtoned to death, for preaching againſt the Egyptian and Jewiſh Idolatry.

Zoan, or Taphnes, was, in Moſes time, the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly reſided; and not unlikely to be the ſame City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Euſebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Aſtronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhiſtor, out of Eupolemus, hath it otherwiſe, ſaying, that Abraham inſtructed the Egyptian Prieſts, and not the King; both which authorities Euſebius citeth. The Septuagint and the Vulgar Edition, for Zoan, write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our Engliſh call it On; and Ptolomie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, toward the South; the other ſomewhat lower on the Eaſter-moſt branch of Nilus, falling into the Sea at Peluſium. And it may be, that Heliopolis, to the South of the River Trojan, was the ſame which Vatablus and our Engliſh call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the ſame which Pomp. Mela and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Prieſt, or Prince, whoſe Daughter Joſeph married. In the Territory adjoyning, Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the High Prieſt of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferiour to that of Jeruſalem (Ptolomy Philopater, then governing in Egypt) which ſtood in the time of Veſpaſian, 333 years after the foundation by Onias, whom Joſephus falſly reporteth herein, to have fulfilled a Prophecy of Eſay, Chap. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terræ Egypti; In that day ſhall the Altar of the Lord be in the midſt of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occaſion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Laſtly, there it was that our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus remained, while Joſeph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (ſaith Brochard) the Fountain is ſtill found, called Jeſus Well, whoſe ſtreams do afterward water the Gardens of Balſamum, no where elſe found in Egypt. And hereof ſee more in Brochard, in his Deſcription of Egypt.

There is alſo in that City of Noph, remembred by Eſay and Ezechiel, the ſame which Hoſea the Prophet calleth Moph; which later name it took from a Mountain adjoyning, ſo called; which Mountain Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and ſo the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mizar. The Chaldæans name it Alchahyr; and Tudalenſis Mizraim.

Peluſium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our Engliſh, write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the ſame with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witneſſeth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Peluſium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (ſaith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta eſt Peluſium; Belbeis that in times paſt was called Peluſium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Dioſpolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierom converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, becauſe it was ſo called in the future.

Ezech. 30. 15, 16.

Bubaſtus (for ſo Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the ſame which the Hebrews call Pibeſeth.

Ezech. 30. 17.

To make the Story more perceivable, I have added a Deſcription of the Land of Goſen, in which the Iſraelites inhabited; with thoſe Cities and places ſo often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes, or Zoan, Heliopolis, or Bethſemes, Balſephon, Succoth, and the reſt; together with Moſes paſſage through the Deſarts of Arabia the Stony. For all Story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleaſure, ſo it no way enricheth the knowledge and underſtanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing ſerve to retain, what we read, in our memories, ſo well as theſe Pictures and Deſcriptions do. In which reſpect I am driven to digreſs in many places, and to interpoſe ſome ſuch Diſcourſe, otherwiſe ſeeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more antient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who, in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath theſe words: Si enim abſque locorum obſervatione res geſtæ narrentur, aut ſine Topographiæ cognitione Hiſtoriæ legantur, adeo confuſa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obſcurum, nihil non difficile elici poſſit; If narration (ſaith he) be made of thoſe things which are performed, without the obſervation of the places wherein they were done; or if Hiſtories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear ſo intricate and confuſed, as we ſhall thereby underſtand nothing but obſcurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greateſt difficulty.

SECT. III.

Of the cruelty againſt the Iſraelites young Children in Egypt; and of Moſes his Preſervation and Education.

BUt to return to the Story it ſelf. It appeareth, that notwithſtanding the labour and ſlavery which the Iſraelites endured, yet they decreaſed not in numbers: in ſo much as Pharaoh, conſidering the danger of diſcontented povetty, and the able bodies of an oppreſſed multitude, how perillous they might be to his eſtate, by ſuggeſtion of the Devil, reſolved to ſlaughter all the male Children of the Hebrews, as ſoon as they ſhould be born. To which end he ſent for Sephora and Thura, women the moſt famous and expert amongſt them, Quæ præerant (ſaith Comeſtor) multitudini obſtetricum, who had command given them over all Mid-wives; by whom (as it ſeemeth) he gave order to all the reſt for the execution of his Edict. For, to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt togegether, had been a ſtrange Parliament. Now, whether theſe two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diverſly diſputed. S. Auguſtine ſtine calls them Hebrews, becauſe it is written Exod. 1. The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Joſephus, Abulenſis and Pererius believe them to be Egyptians. Whoſoever they were, when it pleaſed God to fruſtrate the execution of that ſecret murther, to the end the World might witneſs both the wickedneſs of the Egyptians, and the juſt cauſe, thereby made manifeſt, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding theſe Women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howſoever, to deſtroy all the male Hebrew children born within his Dominions.

Now, beſides the doubts which Pharaoh had of multitudes of the Hebrews, the greateſt part of whom he might have aſſured, by affording them the juſtice which every King oweth to his vaſſals, and the reſt he might have employed, or ſent away, at his pleaſure;

Joſ. ant. l. 2. c. 5.

Joſephus giveth another cauſe of his rage againſt them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Prieſt, that among the Hebrews there ſhould be born a child, who growing to mans eſtate, ſhould become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which (and preſuming that he could reſiſt the Ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature) he ſtretched out his bloudy and mercileſs hand to the execution of his former intent. The ſame prevention Herod long after practiſed, when fearing the ſpiritual Kingdom of Chriſt, as if it ſhould have been temporal, he cauſed all the male children at that time born, to be ſlaughtered. And that Pharaoh had ſome kind of foreknowledg of the future ſucceſs, it may be gathered by his own words, in the tenth Verſe of the fifth of

Exod. 5. 10.

Exodus: Come, let us work wiſely with them, leſt they multiply; and it come to paſs, that if there be War, they joyn themſelves alſo unto our enemies, and fight againſt us, and get them out of the Land. But we ſee, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wiſdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own moſt feeble, and altogether darkened, underſtanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Miniſter of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a ſucking and powerleſs Infant. And this Princeſs having beheld the child, his form and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, ſo pierced her compaſſion, as ſhe did not only preſerve it, and cauſe it to be foſtered; but commanded that it ſhould be eſteemed as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nouriſhed. And for memory that it was her deed, ſhe called the child Moſes, as it were, extractus, or exptus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water; or, after Strom. l. 1.

Joſephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expreſſing Water; and Hiſes, as much as to ſay, as that which is drawn out of Water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moſes was circumciſed before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaoh's Daughter, and by men of the moſt underſtanding, taught and inſtructed: Quem regio more educavit, præfectis ei ſapientibus Ægyptiorum Magiſtris, à quibus erudiretur, ſaith Baſil; unto whom ſhe gave Princely education, appointing over him wiſe Maſters of the Egyptians for his inſtructers. Thereby (ſay Joſephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which alſo the Martyr Stephen in the ſeventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moſes was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians. Which Wiſdom, or Sapience, ſuch as it was, or at leaſt ſo much thereof as Six. Senenſis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moſes and the reign of Joſua.

Phil. de Vita Moyſi.

SECT. IV.

Of Moſes his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain antient Hiſtorians of his War in Æthiopia; and of his Marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Paſtoral life; and that of Pererius of the Books of Geneſis and Job.

WHen Moſes was grown to mans eſtate, Joſephus and Euſebius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years War that he made againſt the Æthiopians; of the beſieging of Seba, afterward by Cambyſes called Meroe; and how he recovered the City by the favour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Æthiopia, whom he took to Wife. So hath Comeſtor a pretty tale of Moſes, how after the end of that War, Tharbis reſiſting his return into Egypt, Moſes, moſt skilful in Aſtronomy, cauſed two Images to be engraven in two precious Stones, whereof the one increaſed memory, the other cauſed forgetfulneſs: Theſe he ſet in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reſerving the other of memory for himſelf; which Ring of forgetfulneſs, after ſhe had a while worn, ſhe began to neglect the love ſhe bare her Husband: and ſo Moſes, without danger, returned into Egypt. But leaving theſe fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the fourtieth year of Moſes age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppreſſed Hebrews, moved by compaſſion, in reſpect of his brother, and ſtirred up by diſdain againſt the other, in the contention he ſlew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a diſpoſition in ſome of his own Nation to accuſe him, for whoſe defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whoſe choſen ſervant he was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Countrey to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forſaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous ſtrangers; and who in future times, were the irreconcileable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleaſed God (working the greateſt things by the weakeſt worldly means) to make the watering of a few ſheep, and the aſſiſting of the Daughter of Raguel the Madianite, an occaſion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of thoſe, and a father-in-law, that fed him, and ſuſtained him in a Countrey neareſt Egypt, fitteſt to return from; neceſſary to be known, becauſe interjacent between Egypt and Judæa, through which he was to lead the Iſraelites; and wherein God held him, till the occaſion which God preſented beſt ſerved. And laſtly, where the glory of the world ſhined leaſt, amidſt mountainous Deſarts, there the glory of God, which ſhineth moſt, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings Son, or an adopted child of great Pharaoh's Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, ſitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of thoſe poor Beaſts onely.

In that part of Arabia near Madian, he conſumed 40 years; and though (as Philo in the Story of Moſes life obſerveth) he did not neglect the care of thoſe flocks, commited to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Paſtoral knowledge; yet in that ſolitary Deſart, he enjoyed himſelf: and being ſeparate from the preaſs of the world, and the troubleſome affairs thereof, he gave himſelf to contemplation, and to make perfect in himſelf all thoſe knowledges, whereof whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the ſame Author alſo judging that his Paſtoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Eſt enim (ſaith Plato) ars Paſtoralis, quaſi præludium ad regnum, hoc eſt, ad regimen hominum, gregis manſuetiſſimi. Quemadmodum bellicoſa ingenia præexercent ſe in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod poſtea in militia, & bello perfectura ſunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At verò præfectura manſueti pecoris, habet quiddam ſimile cum regno in ſubditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Paſtores populorum, non contumeliæ, ſed honoris gratia; The art of keeping Sheep is, as it were, an introductory exerciſe unto a Kingdom, namely, the ruling over men, the moſt gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before-hand exerciſe themſelves in hunting, practiſing on wild beaſts thoſe things which after they will accompliſh in warfare: thoſe brute beaſts affording matter wherein to train themſelves both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattel, hath a kind of reſemblance unto a Kingly rule over ſubjects; therefore Kings are ſtiled Shepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moſes, in the time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Pererius ſuppoſeth, I cannot judge of it, becauſe it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I ſubſcribe to Pererius opinion, That Moſes, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Geneſis; although I cannot deny the reaſon of Pererius conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might ſtrengthen the oppreſſed Hebrews: and by the promiſes of God to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, put them in aſſurance of their delivery from the Egyptian ſlavery, and of the Land of reſt, and plenty, promiſed.

Perer in c. 3. Exod.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to perſwade Pharaoh that he was the Meſſenger of the moſt High, the particulars are written in the firſt fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needleſs. But for the firſt, it is to be noted, that when Moſes deſired to be taught of God, by what name he ſhould make him known, and by whom he was ſent; he received from God ſo much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being Nature. Out of which he delivered him in the firſt part of his Anſwer, a name to be conſidered of by the wiſeſt; and in his ſecond, to be underſtood by all. For, there is nothing that is, or hath being of it ſelf, but the Eternal: which truly is, which is above all, which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment; their ſubſtance waſteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one ſtay, nor being the ſame ſo long as while one may ſay, Now. Likewiſe, whatſoever is conſumed in the longeſt continuance of time, the ſame, in every ſhorteſt piece of time ſuffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one ſtate. Una eſt Dei, & ſola natura quæ verè eſt: id enim quod ſubſiſtit, non habet aliundè, ſed ſuum eſt. Cætera quæ creata ſunt, etiamſi videntur eſſe, non ſunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & poteſt rurſum non eſſe, quod non fuit; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himſelf, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they ſeem to be, yet they are not; for ſometimes they were not; and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in reſpect of the divine Nature, the ſaying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra eſt, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a ſhadow, either empty or deceitful: in compariſon of whom (ſaith Eſay) all Nations are nothing, leſs than nothing, and meer vanity.

Exod. c. 3. v. 13, 14, & 15.

Hier. ad Dam.

Cap. 40. v. 13.

Of the ten Plagues wherewith the Egyptians were ſtrucken, the firſt was by changing the Rivers into bloud; God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water ſay, Lord, thou art juſt, which art, and which waſt; and holy, becauſe thou haſt judged theſe things; for they ſhed the bloud of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore haſt thou given them bloud to drink.

Cap. 16. v. 5.

The reſt of the Plagues by Froggs, Lice, Flies, or ſtinging Waſps; by the death of their Cattel; by leprous Scabs; by Hail and Fire; by Graſhoppers; by Darkneſs; after which, Pharaoh forbad Moſes his preſence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer than the pain and peril laſted; till ſuch time as his own firſt-bon, and the firſt-born of all his Nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God perforce) ſtood upon no condition; whereas before, he firſt yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reſerving their beſtial; but he was now content for the preſent, that the Iſraelites ſhould not onely depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being paſt) he ſuddenly repented him, as his purſuit after them proved. For, when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moſes received) ſlain a Lamb, without ſpot or blemiſh, for the Paſſover (a Sacrament of the moſt clean and unſpotted Saviour) and with the bloud thereof coloured the poſt and lintern of the doors; the Angel of God in the night ſmote every firſt-born of Egypt, from the Son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave, the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At which terrible judgement of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is ſaid, to their departure. The Egyptians (ſaith Epiphanius) did, in after-times, imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Iſraelites uſed after the Paſſover; aſcribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely mark their Sheep and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preſerve them from lightning, and other harms.

SECT. V.

Of Pharaoh's purſuit of the Iſraelites; and of their paſſage towards the Red Sea, ſo far as Succoth.

NOw, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardned by God) he bethought him as well of the honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many Calamities and Plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoils of his people, and in deſpight of himſelf. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readineſs, he conſulted with himſelf, what way the Iſraelites were like to take. He knew that the ſhorteſt and faireſt paſſage was through the Countrey of the Philiſtims. But becauſe theſe people were very ſtrong, and a warlike Nation, and (in all probability) of his Allies, he ſuſpected that Moſes meant to find ſome other out-let, to wit, through the Deſart of Etham; and there, becauſe the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard acceſs, and that Moſes was peſtered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, Cattel, he thought impossible for the Israelites to escape him that way. In the mean while, having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and six hundred of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the antient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the War for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000 Horse, and 20000 Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assail the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might join themselves to his Enemies within the Land; or, being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the Plagues which God grieved him withal, enforced him, at this time, to give an assent to their departure; perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet, by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day, he went on sixteen miles: which in so hot a Countrey, and to drive their Cattel and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerful Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprizes; so he lay not still in the Ditch, crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wise Man, and a valiant and Skilful Conductor; as by all his Actions and Counsels, from this day to his Death, well appeared.

Exod. 14. 7.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passover, he appointed a general Assembly, or Rendezvous of all the Hebrews at Rameses, in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrews; and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dough, and Paste, not staying to make it into Bread; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaoh's Horse-Men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Rameses East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and encamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Month Abib; which Month, from that time forward, they were commanded to account as the first Month of the Year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their Year in some other Month, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now re-called by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their Politick Year, which was not now abrogated, but rather, by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use.

The Territory of Gosen was afterward called Rameses after the name of this City, as appeareth in Gen. 47. & Numb. 33. Exod. 13.

Exod. 23. 16. & 34. 22.

Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, middest, or ending of the Year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick Year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every Month, and the whole form of their Year, like enough it is, that Moses himself in forty Years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust; but that any rule of framing their Kalendar was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now, because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here, at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew Year; with the difference between them and other Nations, in ordering the account of Time.

SECT. VI.

Of the Solary and Lunary Years; and how they are reconciled; with the form of the Hebrew Year, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Months are thus named.

The First Month, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
II. Jar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
III. Sivan, or Sinan, or Siban.	3. May.
IV. Tamuz.	4. June.
V. Ab.	5. July.
VI. Ehul.	6. August.
VII. Tisri, or Ethavin, or Ethanim.	7. September.
VIII. Marcheſuan, or Mechaſuan, or Bul, or with Joſephus, Morſonane.	8. October. Ant. 1. 3.
IX. Chiſleu, or Caſleu.	9. November.
X. Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December.
XI. Sebeth, or Sabeth.	11. January.
XII. Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

VE Adar, was an intercalary Month, added some years unto the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary Year agree; which (besides the general inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the Months of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Month of the Year, and withall on a set day, both of the Moon, and of the Month: as the Feast of the First-fruits, the New-Moons, and the like; which could not have so been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in some other part of the Month, or the Month it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the Year. Deut. 16.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time that is, the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more days, as the errour committed in foregoing Years required. The errour grew at first, by not knowing what number of days made up a compleat Year. For though by the continual course of the Son, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough, even to the most savage of all People, when a Year hath passed over them; them; yet the neceſſity of ordinary occurences, that are to be numbred by a ſhorter Tally, makes this long meaſure of whole Years inſufficient for the ſmaller ſort of more daily Affairs. Therefore Men obſerved the Monthly conſpicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the Year into twelve parts, ſubdividing the Month into twenty nine Days and Nights, and thoſe again into their Quarters and and Hours. But as the marks of Time are ſenſibly

30. & 29. and eaſily diſcerned; ſo the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the underſtanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing leſs time by eleven days, or thereabout, than the yearly courſe of the Sun through the Zodiak, in the ſpace of ſixteen Years, every Month was found in the quite contrary part of the Year to that wherein it was placed at the firſt. This cauſed them to add ſome days to the Year, making it to conſiſt of twelve Months, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courſes of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errours. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any ſet number of whole days; neither did the Moon change always at one Hour; but the very Minutes and leſſer Fractions were to be obſerved by him, that would ſeek to reduce their motions (which motions alſo were not ſtill alike) into any certain rule.

Here lay much Wiſdom, and deep Art, which could not ſoon be brought to perfection. Yet, as making an eſtimate at random, the Athenians held the Year to contain three hundred and ſixty days; wherein moſt of the Greeks concurred with them. That three hundred and ſixty days filled up the Grecian Year (beſides many collateral proofs) it is Plin. l. 34. cap. 6. manifeſt by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in the honour of Demetrius Phalerius, which were (ſaith he) 360, whilſt as yet the Year exceeded not that number of days. By this account, neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their Months; neither could their Months continue many Years in their own places; but muſt needs be ſhifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the days forgotten to be inſerted into the Almanack by Men, but not forgotten by the ſuperiour Bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, becauſe the ſolemnity of the Olympian Games was to be held at the full Moon, and withall on the fifteenth day of the Month Hecatombæon (which anſwereth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this Month might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding ſome two days to the laſt Month of every Year; thoſe Games being held once in four Years. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter even; which cauſed them ſometime to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the ſecond of the Month Bædromion (agreeing nearly with our Auguſt) ſometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to inſert another for it in their fourth Lunary Year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding, their Month of June would every Year have grown colder and colder, had they not ſought to keep all upright, by intercalating into each other Olympiad, that is, each eight Year, one whole Month, which they called the ſecond Poſideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one Month of twenty nine days, another of thirty days, and ſo ſucceſſively through the whole year. Thus, with much labour, they kept their Year, as near as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but theſe marks, which they obſerved, were found at length to be deceitful guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth Years intercalation, that it ſhould not deceive them in eleven hours and eighteen minutes at the leaſt, or ſome ways in thirty four Hours and ten Minutes, or thirty ſix and forty one Minutes; which differences, would in few Ages have bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who, not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth Years intercalation, deviſed a Cycle of nineteen years, within the Moon, having 235 times run out her circuit, met with the Sun in the ſame place, and on the ſame day of the Year; as in the nineteenth Year before paſt ſhe had done. This invention of Meton, was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called, The Golden Number: which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been uſed; for by the intercalation of ſeven Months in the nineteen Years, all was ſo even, that no ſenſible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one Year could not be perceiv'd, was very apparent in a few of thoſe Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle ſeven Hours, and ſome Minutes of the preciſe rule. Therefore Calippus deviſed a new Cycle, containing four of Metons, that is to ſay, ſeventy ſix Years; and afterwards, Hipparchus, a noble Aſtrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding ſome errour in the former Obſervations, which they diligently corrected. The laſt reformation of the Kalendar, was that which Julius Cæſar made, who, by advice of the beſt Mathematicians then to be found, examining the courſes of thoſe Heavenly Bodies, reduced the Year unto the form which is now in uſe with us, containing 365 Days and ſix Hours, which Hours in four Years make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth Year, the 24 of February. The correction of the Julian Year by Pope Gregory the 13th, Anno Dom. 1582, is not as yet entertained by general conſent; it was indeed but as a Note added unto the Work of Cæſar; yet a Note of great importance: For whereas it was obſerved, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, An. Dom. 234, entred the Æquinoctial on the twenty one day of March, was in the Year 1583 ten days ſooner found, in that time Pope Gregory ſtruck out of the Kalendar ten days, following the fourth of October; ſo that in ſtead of the fifth day, was written the fifteenth; by which means the movable Feaſts depending on the Sun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in ſuch time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence-forward, in every hundred year, the Leap-day ſhould be omitted, excepting ſtill the fourth hundred; becauſe the Sun doth not in his yearly courſe take up full ſix hours above the 365 days; but faileth ſo many minutes, as in 400 years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of twenty nine Years, which the Hebrews uſed, was ſuch as neither did need any nice curioſity of hours, minutes, and other leſſer fractions to help it; neither did in ſumming up the days of the whole Year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out ſo, that always the Kalends, or firſt day of the Month, was at the new Moon; and becauſe that day was Feſtival, they were very careful, as well to obſerve the ſhort Year of the Moon, paſſing through all the twelve Signs in one Month, as that longer of the the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan, their first Month, which is about our March, or April, thirty days; to Jar, their second Month twenty nine days; and so successively thirty to one, twenty nine to another. Hereby it came to pass, that every two Months of theirs contain'd somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing twenty nine days twelve hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous, or Epacti days; which made up seven Months in nineteen years; to six of which seven were commonly given thirty days, to one of them twenty nine days, or otherwise, as was found requisite. Their common Year (as appeareth by the several days of each Month) contained 354 days, which fail of the Year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, eleven whole days, with some Fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one Year, yet in the Cycle of nineteen Years, were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of the Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day of the Year, Month, and Week, yea, commonly on the same Hour of the Day, where they had been at the beginning of it nineteen years before.

Sig. derep. Heb. lib. 3. cap. 1. Divers have diversly set down the form of the Hebrew Year, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every second Year, they did add a Month of twenty two days; every fourth Year a Month of twenty three, in regard of eleven days and a half wanting in twelve Moons, to fulfil a Year of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in twenty two or twenty three days; and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the Year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the Months in the Years following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon.

Genebrard Chron. l. 2. Ginebrard saith, that every third Year, or second Year, as need required, they did intercalate one Month, adding it at the years end unto the other twelve. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the Years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me-thinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness, until the very last of the nineteen Years. For (to omit such as grosly) some there are who say, that after three Years, when besides the days spent in thirty six courses of the Moon, thirty three days are left remaining, that is, eleven days of each Year; then did the Hebrews add a Month of thirty days; keeping three days, as it were, in plussage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth Year; at which time, besides the intercalary Month, remained six days, namely, three surmounting that Month, and the Epact of three Years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the eighteenth Year; at which time they have eighteen days in hand: all which, with the Epact of the nineteenth Year, make up a Month of twenty nine days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; but surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18th Year every Month were removed from his own place by the distance of 48 days, that is half a quarter of a Year and more; which inconvenience, by such a reckoning, was unavoidable. Wherefore I prefer the common opinion, which prevents such dislocation of the Months, by setting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the eighth Year. For the six days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the third and sixth Years, added unto the twenty two days, arising out of the Epacts of the seven and eight Years, do fitly serve to make up a Month, with the borrowing of one day or two from the Year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the Year ensuing vary the less from the proper season of every Month. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Months and Years, by which they guided their Accounts.

SECT. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red-Sea; and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FRom Succoth, in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desart of Etham, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of that Wilderness, though he intended nothing less than to go out of that way, of all other the neerest. But being assured of the multitude of Horse-Men and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himself from being encompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia, being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects: the first two, natural; the third, divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, perswaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not of two Millions of Souls (for it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly pass over those Desart and high Mountains with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that fastness he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest number of them. For these his own words, They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderness hath shut them in, do shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the All-powerful God was such, by whose Spirit, onely wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the success upon his own understanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, sixteen miles distant; and sate down between two ledges of Mountains adjoyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Baalzephon towards the South; the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple, dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as,

It is probable that all those Egyptians, and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledg of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Dominus

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage up and down, than that it is any proper name.

Dominus speculæ, sive custodiæ; Lord of the watch-tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arrest them, and force them to return to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Egyptii diis fœcundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith S. Hierom. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the Watch-tower asleep, or out of countenance.

Exod. 13. 17. Now, these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm Land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judæa, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and took the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, between the Mountains, which made a streight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but got sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wash of the Sea; in so much as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutiny, at that time when it behooved them most to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped.

Chap. 17. 11. And fear, Which, saith the Book of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in God's former Promises, and to be forgetful of their own strength and multitudes.

SECT. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea; and of the Red Sea it self.

But Moses, who feared nothing but God himself, perswaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those that assuredly trusted in him; using this comfortable and resolved speech:

Exod. 14. 13. Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which, Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment

Exod. 14. 16. to go on, in these words; Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward; and lift thou up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night, finding the sands uncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia; two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern Wind, and by Moses Rod, to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written, The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them;

Josua 24. 7. also the Pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein, either by his immediate Power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning-watch, Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side; and Pharaoh (as the dawn of the day began to enlighten the obscure air) finding a beginning of the Sea's return, hastened himself towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea, moved by the power of God, ran back towards the Land with unresistable fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For, it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being strucken with fear of death, ran one a-thwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrews, their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawn out; the Sea coming against them with supernatural violence. Exod. 14. 27.

Lyranus, upon Exod. 14. and others, following the Opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the Children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Aminadab, Prince, or Leader of the Tribe of Judah, first made the adventure; and therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the Prophecie of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers Sons shall bow down unto thee. But Hierom, upon Hosea 11. condemns this Opinion: And though it be true, that Judah had the first place in all their miracles in the Desart, and, as we now call it, led the Van-guard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet, that Moses himself was the Conducter of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, it is written in the 77. Psalm; Thou didst lead thy people, like Sheep, by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancie, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135 Psalm, according to the vulgar: Divisit Mare Rubrum in divisiones; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became a green Field, or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written, Psalm 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy ways: and in the last Book of Wisdom, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now, this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chencres, perished in the 16 year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in natural colour from other Waters. But, as Philostratus in his third Book noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait, between Arabia the Happy, and Æthiopia, or the Land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolemy calleth Possodium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not above six leagues in breadth, and the same also filled every where with Islands, but afterwards it extendeth it self 58 leagues from coast to coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa on one side, and Æthiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermost end and indraught of that Sea; where the Turk now keeps his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf; but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites, of the City Hero, sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Pliny calls it Cambisu, by which name it was known, saith he, before it was called Hero, many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum; King Juba, Læniticum; others Plin. l. 6. c. 23.

2 King. 19. Jos. An. 8. cap. 2.

more properly, Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana, which the Septuagint call Elath; Ptolemy, Elana; Pliny, Læna; Josephus, Ilana; and Marius Niger, Aila: there is also Ilalah in Assyria, to which Salmanasser carried the Israelites captive, 2 King. 8. 11. which Ilalah in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elæa; and in the first of Chron. 5. Ala. But, as for the Red Sea, on the parts thereof, thus diversly named, the Moors, and Arabians (Vassals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Meca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythræum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythræus: and because Erythros in the Greek signifieth Red; hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythræus, the Son of Perseus and Andromeda, it took the name of the Red Sea, as Q. Curtius conjectureth; which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it seems to me, by the view of a Discovery of that Sea, in the year 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East-India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of a redness, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Islands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For, I find by the report of Castro, a principal Commander under Gama (which Discourse I gave Mr. Richard Hacluit to publish) that there is an Island called Dalaqua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25 leagues, and 12 in breadth; the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Island, being of a redish colour, serve for a foil to the waters about it; to make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24 degrees of Septentrional latitude to 27 (which make in length of Coast 180 miles, lying as it doth, Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs, and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams give a kind of redish lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea, towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corral grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Islands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those, growing under water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shadow of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such; which Johannes Barros in his second Decade, eighth Book, and first Chapter, confirmeth.

Arrian. de gest. Alex. Mag. l. 8. Strabo. l. 6.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion-Gaber adjoyning, now Toro, called by the antient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian, or Midian, is for 16 or 17 leagues together, along Northward toward Sues, some three leagues, or 9 English miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28 leagues, of which, the first 26 have 9 miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward, the Lands, both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and strengthen it so fast, as for 6 miles together, it is not above 3 miles over; from thence upward the Land on Egypt side falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay, or Cove, for some 10 miles together, after which the Land grows upon the Sea again, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at 4 miles breadth, or there about, in which Tract it was that Moses past it over, though others would have it to be over against Elana, or Toro, but without judgment; for from Rameses to Pihacheroth, and Baalzephon, there is not above 30 miles interjacent, or 35 miles at most, which Moses past over in three days; and between the Land of Egypt, opposite to Elana, or Toro, the distance is above 80 miles. For Rameses, to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30 degrees 5 minutes of Septentrional latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying, in effect, North and South.

SECT. IX.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebb.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who, in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebb, upon a great Spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the floud, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place, with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly Wind, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that believe not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same natural reason unto which they fastened themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary, and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For whersoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land, as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to the dry land. Now, Moses entring the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water 10 or 12 miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and between it and where Moses past, who entred the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea; it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve, or Strait, had ben by the ebb of a Spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the floud increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the tide, on his right hand; and so taken ground again at the end of the Sea, at Sues it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharaoh, by any return of waters, could not have perished, as he did; and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to return back by a strong East-wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebb more than ordinary; for that Sea did not ly East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North-West-wind, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-East into the Sea. But the East-Wind blew a-thwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof, the other part remained toward Sues, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was checkt by that Sea, which used in times before to ebb away, the floud prest him, and over-welm'd him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgment, generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the Æthiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharaoh, and wan divers Cities, seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grosnes, and distraction: that rather then he would have endured the hardnes of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded to take that way, and fore-told him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed, as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety; and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God; Wherefore crieſt thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward, and lift thou up thy Rod, and ſtretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at that time of Pharaoh's approach any ebb at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters by a strong East-wind, whereby the sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand,

Cap. 14. v. 21. so that the Waters were a Wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path, not that the Waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the School-men have fancied. For, had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Countrey, on his own Coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein, his people having had so many hundreds of years experience of the Tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any fore-known or natural Accident, but by God's powerful Hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when, looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been over-taken by the ordinary return of the floud, before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the floud, which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast a-shore on the coast of Arabia, where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side; where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary floud would have carried them; Which floud doth not any where cross the Channel, and run a-thwart it, as it must have done from Egypt-side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea; and to which their carkasses should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius, in the lives of the Fathers, affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the Country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those beasts, birds, plants or other creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaoh's destruction; as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a God of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied, and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Orosius, in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400 years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's Chariot-wheels were to be seen at a low water, on the Egyptian sands; and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them; with a discourse of Laws.

SECT. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie; with a continuation of the Story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

But to go on with the Story of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was born in the Year of the World, 2434, Saphrus then governing Assyria; Orthopolis, Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Crioſus, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Deucalion, Thessaly. He fled into Midian, when he had lived forty years, in the Year of the World, 2474; and two years after that was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the year, 2514, the last Month of the Year. On the fourteenth day of the first Hebrew Month Abib, or the fifteenth of that Month, beginning the day (as they) at Sun-setting, in the Year of the World, 2514 was the celebration of the Passover; and in the dead of the night of the same day, were all the first-born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. the fifteenth day of the first Month

Acts 7. Josua 14. 2474. 2514. Pag. 254.

Exod 12. Numb. 33. Month of the Hebrews, called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World 2514. Moſes, with the Children of Iſrael removed from the general Aſſembly at Rameſes, and marched to Succoth.

Exod. 13. And departing thence, they made their third ſtation at Etham: and journying from Etham, they encamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the ſame night, Numb 33. Exod. 14. after midnight, they paſt the Red Sea; Pharaoh and his Army periſhing in their return, about the firſt dawn of the day. Moſes having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God for the delivery of Iſrael; and making no ſtay on that coaſt, entred the Deſarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding no water in that paſſage, he encamped at Marah, in the Exod. 15. Deſart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. 22. is called Sur, 25 miles from the Sea; where the Children of Iſrael, Numb. 33. preſt with extreme thirſt, murmured againſt Moſes the ſecond time; firſt, at Pharaohs approach at Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moſes taking the branches of a Tree, growing near a Lake of bitter Water, and caſting the ſame thereinto, made the ſame ſweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who, upon the Tree of the Croſs, changed the bitterneſs of everlaſting Death, into the ſweetneſs of eternal Life. Pliny remembers theſe bitter Fountains in his ſixth Book, twenty ninth Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Seſoſtris firſt, Darius after him, and laſtly, Ptolomy the ſecond, began to cut an artificial River, thereby by Boats and ſmall Shipping to Trade and Navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the ſixth Manſion, a march of eight miles: where Exod. 15. finding twelve Fountains of ſweet Water, and three-Numb. 33. ſcore and ten Palmtrees, he reſted divers days.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Town or City in Moſes time, I cannot affirm. And yet the ſcarcity of Waters in that Region was ſuch, as Helim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William Archbiſhop of Tyre, in his Hi- William Tyre. l. 15. cap. 16. ſtory of the Holy Warr, found at Helim, the ruines of a great and antient City. And at ſuch time as Baldwin the firſt paſt that way into Egypt. Ingreſſus (ſaith he) Helim Civitatem antiquiſſimam, populo Iſraelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quem cum perveniſſet, loci illius incolæ, Regis adventu præcognito, naviculam ingredientes, in Mare vicinum ſe contulerunt; Entring Helim, a very antient City, well known ſometime to the people of Iſrael; whither, when he came, the Inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boat, and ſhifted themſelves into the Sea lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and ſat down by the banks of the Red Sea; the ſeventh Manſion. For it ſeemeth, that he had knowledg of Amalech, who repaired to reſiſt his paſſage through part of Arabia. And Moſes, who had not as yet trained the Hebrews, appointed to bear Arms; nor aſſured the minds of the reſt, who encountring with the leaſt miſery, were more apt to return to their quiet ſlavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every way accompanied them in that paſſage, or at this time to undertake or ſuſtain ſo dangerous an Enemy: he therefore made ſtay at this Manſion, until the fifteenth of this ſecond Month, called Zim, or Exod. 16. Jiar; and made the eighth Manſion in the Deſart of Zin; where the Children of Iſrael mutinied againſt Moſes the third time, having want of Food. In the ſixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moſes omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of every ſeveral encamping, in the thirty third of Numbers, it is ſet down.

Here it pleaſed God to ſend ſo many flights of Quails, as the Country about their encamping was covered with them. The Morning following, it alſo rained Manna, being the ſixteenth of their Month, which ſerved them in ſtead of Bread. For now was the ſtore conſumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great num- Exod. 16. bers of Cattel and Sheep among them, yet it ſeemeth, that they durſt not feed themſelves with many of thoſe; but reſerved them, both for the Milk to relieve the Children withal, and for Breed to ſtore themſelves when they came to the Land promiſed.

From hence towards Raphidim, they made two removes of 20 miles; the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, diſtant from Raphidim ſix miles. Here, being again preſt with want of Water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themſelves to be fed and beaten after the manner of Beaſts, than to ſuffer a caſual, and ſometime neceſſary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every manly mind ſeeks after for the love of God, and their own freedoms. But Moſes, with the ſame Rod which he divided the Sea withall, in the ſight of the Elders of Iſrael, brought waters out Exod. 17. of the Rock, wherewith the whole multitude were ſatisfied.

SECT. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occaſion of the battel with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming; who, being a Kenite, was Prieſt of Madian.

AND while Moſes encamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and gueſſed that he meant to lead the children of Iſrael through their Countrey (which being barren of it ſelf, would be utterly waſted by ſo great a multitude of People and Cattel) thought it moſt for their advantage to ſet upon them at Raphidim, where the want of water, and all other things needful for the life of Man, enfeebled them. On the other ſide, Moſes perceiving their reſolutions, gave charge to Joſua, to draw out a ſufficient number of the ableſt Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Between Exod. 17. whom and Iſrael the victory remained doubtful for the moſt part of the day; the Hebrews and the Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulſes for many hours. And had not the ſtrength of Moſes Prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent than all reſiſtance and attempt made by the bodies of Men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterpriſe. For thoſe bodies which are unacquainted with ſcarcity of Food, and thoſe minds whom a ſervile education hath dulled, being beaten, and deſpaired in their firſt attempts, will hardly, or never, be brought again to hazard themſelves.

After this Victory, Jethro repaired to Moſes, bringing with him Moſes his Wife, and his two Sons, which either Jethro forbare to conduct, or Moſes to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better aſſured himſelf of that part of Arabia. For it is written in Exod. 18. 1. When Jethro, the Prieſt of Madian, Moſes Father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moſes, &c. of which, the laſt deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and aſſurance, he then repaired to his Son-in-law, Moſes, at Sinai; where, among other things he adviſed Moſes to appoint Judges, and other Officers over Iſrael, rael, being himself unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so many thousands of People, full of discontentment and private controversie.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, 11, 17. it is manifest: where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the Son of Jethro, the Father-in-law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tent unto the Plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise, in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadesh; and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rock. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the Children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the six Sons which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledg of the true God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the Daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jethro's Daughter the Mother of his Children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For, in the fifteenth of Genesis, vers. 19. these Kenites, or Chusites, are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether Idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the Children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Cadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other Sons were born; which he did (referring my self to better judgments) rather, because they were more antient, than by anticipation,

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites, neer the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his Wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his Children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites, with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000 Israelites, as far back as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his Wives kindred inhabited; seeing himself coming with 600000 able Men, was encountred by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himself and Israel had wandered forty years.

That Jethro, or Jothor, Raguel, or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar, and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Revel, Exod. 2. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. 1. and 4. 18. & 18. 1. & 6. 9, 10, 12. & in Numb. 10. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

SECT. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

THe rest of the Months of this Year 2515 were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neer the Mountain of Sinai, or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai and Horeb were distinct Mountains: Hierom, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures: For, in Exod. 3. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exodus 24. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm, vers. 19. Horeb: in Exodus 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. vers. 24. And again, Deut. 4. 10. and 15. and Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chronicles 5. 10. and in Malachi 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus, 48. 7. they are named as one. Which heardest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the Vengeance. Somewhat they are dis-joined at the top, by the report of Peter Belonius; who, in the year 1588 past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsier de Fumet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher Hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of Water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some hundred Religious Persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant Gardens, delicate Fruits, and excellent Wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers which pass that way.

Pet. Bel. l. 2. cap. 62.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of Water neer Sinai, in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped thereabout almost a Year, and drew no Water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to Powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the Powder thereof into the Water, and made the Children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this Mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he stayed a whole Year, wanting some ten or twelve days: for he removed not till the twentieth day of the second Month of the second Year; he arrived about the five and fortieth day after the egression; the Law being given the fiftieth day.

At

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29th Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that Book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10th Chapter. Whereof (because there is no Story nor other Passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and use thereof: whereby, if the Reader find the Story any way dis-joyned, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of Laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfullest man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For, as the North Star is the most fixed Director of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the Guide and Conductor of all in general to the haven of eternal life. The Law of Nature, from God his eternal Law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures; the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous Men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinews of every Estate in the World, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just Law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Mind without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Antient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Laws were honoured as Gods, or, as the Sons of Gods: and the rest, that made either additions, or corrections, were commended to all Posterity for men of no less vertue, and no less liberally beneficial to their Countreys, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one; as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedæmonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solon; the Romans, sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the peoples themselves: others from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

SECT. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not always taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sence used. For, if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the Rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or, it is taken for any private Ordinance of Superiours or Inferiours: for the Commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their Decrees do also usurp that Title, according to the general acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Wo unto them that decree wicked Decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the People. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Laws, though evil and insufficient: Mala lex est, quæ tumultuarie posita est; It is an evil Law that is made tumultuously. So as all Ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws.

Esay 10.

Ethic. l. 4. cap. 1.

The word Law is also taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the Law of the flesh, which the Divines call legem fomitis, is to be understood. For every Law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sence, as elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart, is called the frame, or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law; But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures, are sometime called (a) Laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the Law eternal; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Gen. 6. 5. Item 8. 2.

(a) So Virgil, Continuo has leges æternaque fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; where also it is to be noted, that he joyns Leges and Fœdera together, as in the Scripture the Laws is oftentimes called the Covenant. Arist. Ethic. 5. c. 5.

Also private contracts among Merchants, and other Tradesmen, do often put on the name of Laws. But Law, commonly and properly, is taken for a right Rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Civil Community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quàm leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for Laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be termed nor thought Laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia justa sunt factiva, & conservativa fœlicitatis; Just Laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God, and his Worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines, à legendo, or, à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, saith Varro; For, after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoak, and a band: as confregerunt jugum, diruperunt vincula; they have broken the yoak, they have broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let us break their bands asunder, and let us cast away their cords from us.

Plato in Dial. 1. de Leg.

Jer. 5. 5.

Psal. 2.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God; and because of God's peoples voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, use the word διαθήκη, a Testament, or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force, as Heb. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrews call the Law Thorah, of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nomos, of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his own due; the power of the Law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium Legis, imperium Dei est; The reign of the Law, is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers; Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to ſhun: or, Lex eſt omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen, or Princeſs of things both humane and divine. But this deſcription is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wiſdom of Nature: the reaſon and underſtanding of the prudent; and the rule of right and wrong. For, as a right line is called, Index ſui, & curvi, the demonſtrance of it ſelf, and of the crooked; ſo is the Law the judge and meaſure of right and wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodneſs of operation; and though Law, as touching the ſubſtance and eſſence, conſiſts in underſtanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Jus is alſo diverſly taken, as ſometime for the matter of the Law, and for common right: ſometime for the Law it ſelf; as Jus civile, or Jus gentium. Iſidore diſtinguiſheth the two general words, Jus and Fas; whereof Jus, Iſid. Etym. ſaith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, Jus lex humana. To go over another man's field is permitted by Gods Law, not by Mans; and therefore in a thing out of controverſie Virgil uſed both theſe words: as Fas & jura ſinunt, God and men permit.

The word Jus, or Right, is derived or taken from the old Subſtantive Noun juſſus, a bidding or commandment: or, perhaps, from the Greek Ζεὺς, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latine Genitive caſe Jovis; becauſe, as the Scripture ſpeaks, the judgment is Gods. For, as it is certain that jus-jurandum came of Jovis-jurandum (for ſo we find it written in Nonius out of the antient, in which ſenſe the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ): ſo alſo we may ſay, that Jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis eſt; becauſe as God is the Author, and Pattern, and Maintainer of Right, ſo alſo in his Vicegerents, the Magiſtrates, he is the Pronouncer and Executor of Right. Of this Jus the juſt are denominated, Juſtus à Jure, and Juſtitia à Juſto; The Right gives name to the Righteous; and Juſtice takes her name from the Juſt.

SECT. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternal.

But, becauſe Laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, firſt to divide and diſtinguiſh them. I mean, thoſe ſorts of Laws from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane Laws to their infinite and horrible confuſion.

The Law Eternal is thus defined by Thomas. Lex P. 2. q. 2. art. 1. æterna eſt æternus divinæ ſapientiæ conceptus, ſecundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipſo præcognitarum; The eternal Law is the eternal conceit of God's Wiſdom, as it is referred to the government of things Th. q. 36. art. 1. foreknown by himſelf. Or, Lex æterna eſt ſumma atque æterna ratio divinæ ſapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad deſtinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipſarum modum aliquem neceſſitatis adferat; It is high and eternal reaſon of divine ſapience: as it directeth all things in ſuch ſort to their proper ends, impoſing a kind of neceſſity, according to their ſeveral natures, or conditions. Now, the difference lies in this: That as the ſame divine underſtanding directs all theſe to their proper ends; ſo it is called Providence: but, as it impoſeth a neceſſity, according to the nature of all things which it directs, ſo it is called a Law.

Of this Eternal Law Cicero took knowledge, when in his Book of Laws he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad rectè faciendum impellens & à delicto avocans: quæ non tum incipit lex eſſe cum ſcripta eſt, ſed tum orta eſt. Orta autem ſimul eſt cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum & ad vetandum, ratio eſt recta ſummi Jovis; That perfect reaſon and nature of things, incouraging or impelling to rightful actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (ſaith he) then begin to be a law when it was written, but when it had Being. Being and beginning it had together with divine underſtanding; and therefore a true Law, and a fit Princeſs to command and forbid, is the right Reaſon of the moſt high God. This eternal Law (if we conſider it in God, or as God) is always one and the ſame; the nature of God being moſt ſimple: but as it is referred to divers objects, ſo the reaſon of man finds it divers and manifold. It alſo ſeemeth one Law in reſpect of things neceſſary, as the motions of the heavens, ſtability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwiſe to things contingent: another Law to men, another to other creatures having life, and to all thoſe that be inanimate.

By this eternal Law all things are directed, as by the counſel and providence of God: from this Law all Laws are derived, as from the rule univerſal, and thereto referred, as the operation of the ſecond to the firſt.

The eternal, and the divine Law, differ only in conſideration; the eternal directing more largely: Tho. & Aug.

as well every creature, to their proper and natural ends, as it doth Man to his ſupernatural; but the divine Law to a ſupernatural end onely: the natural Law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal; as it were a ſtream from the fountain.

The Law humane or temporal is alſo thence drawn, in that it hath the form of right Reaſon; from which if it differ, it is then impoſitio iniqua, a wicked impoſition; and onely borroweth the name of a Law.

To this eternal Law all things are ſubjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether neceſſary or contingent, natural or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the univerſal, and therefore it is the Law alſo of things which are ſimple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praiſe God their Creator and Director: as, Praiſe him all ye his Angels: praiſe him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: Heavens of heavens, for he hath eſtabliſhed them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which ſhall not paſs: Praiſe ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deeps; Fire and Hail, Snow and Vapours, ſtormy Winds which execute his Word: Mountains and Hills, fruitful Trees, and all Cedars; Beaſts and all Cattel, &c. Now, as the reaſonable creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity propoſed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) ſo all other natural things and creatures have in themſelves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cauſe, or end propoſed. For Beaſts are led by ſenſe, and natural inſtinct: things without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward; things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatſoever is appoſed. This kind of working, the Ariſtotelians aſcribe to common Nature; others to Fate; a difference uſed in terms only; it being no other than God's general providence: for, as it is truly ſaid of God, that he is omnia ſuper omnia: ſo are all things which appear in themſelves thence derived, there-under ſubjected, thence-from by his eternal Law and Providence directed, even from the greateſt to the leaſt of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The School-men are very curious and ample in the conſideration of theſe Laws: and in diſcourſe of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But, as the profit is manifeſt in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reaſon, ſenſe, vegetation, or appetitions, to conduct them: ſo is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For, according to S. Auguſtine, Lex æterna eſt, qua juſtum eſt, ut omnia ſint ordinatiſſima; The Law eternal is that, whereby it is juſt, that all things ſhould be diſpoſed in the beſt and goodlieſt order.

Laſtly, it is diſputed, whether the eternal Law be immutable, yea or no? But the reſolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Auguſtine uſeth a ſufficient argument in his firſt Book of Free-will, the ſixth Chapter. For the Law of Moſes, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to laſt until the time of the Pædagogie of Gods people, or Introduction to Chriſt, ſhould be expired; which time of expiration, ſome think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Croſs he ſaid, Conſummatum eſt. But I rather think theſe words of our Saviour to have no other ſignification, than that now the Prophecy of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For ſo S. John expounds it, when he ſaith, v. 28. That Chriſt ſeeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut conſummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this alſo might be fulfilled, ſaid, I thirſt: though I deny not, but at the ſame time alſo the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the Law Ceremonial, and of ſo much of the Judicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the New Teſtament and Goſpel of Chriſt. For the immutable Law of God, though preſcribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it ſelf; but the things preſcribed change according to this eternal Ordinance, of which the Wiſdom of Solomon, And being one, ſhe can do all things, and remaining in her ſelf, reneweth all.

SECT. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

OF the Law of Nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the School-men; only as it is conſidered in Man, it is called The impreſſion of divine Light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reaſonable creature. Lex Naturalis eſt impreſſio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio Legis æternæ in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural Law to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Jus naturale eſt quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus iſtud non humani generis proprium, ſed omnium animalium quæ terra marique naſcuntur, avium quoque commune eſt; The Law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the ſame is common to all living creatures, as well Birds, as to thoſe the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

Aug. in Ep. ad Hil. 89. & in Evang. Joh. tract. 49.

Ulp. de juſtitia & jure. l. 1. tit. 1.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that diſpoſition, inſtinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal Providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, inlightning our formal reaſon; ſo it is more than ſenſe in Beaſts; and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not ſenſe alone in Beaſts, which teacheth them at firſt ſight, and without experience or inſtruction, to flie from the enemies of their lives: ſeeing that Bulls and Horſes appear unto the ſenſe more fearful and terrible, than the leaſt kind of Dogs; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other; yea, though by them never ſeen before, and that as ſoon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it ſenſe, which hath taught other Beaſts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Neſts high or low, according to the tempeſtuous or quiet ſeaſons: or the Birds of India, to make their Neſts on the ſmalleſt twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the Tree, or elſewhere, to ſave their Eggs and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beaſts, whoſe weight ſuch a twig will not bear, and which would fear to fall into the Water. The inſtances in this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of Plants, that ſome Trees, as the female of Palmitto, will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in ſight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unſearchable Wiſdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reaſon of Man hath made it ſelf ſubject, and a Vaſſal to Paſſions, and Affections Brutal: and incorrupt, where time and cuſtom hath bred in Men a new nature, which alſo, as is aforeſaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which St. Augustine calleth the Law of Reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted: that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrain'd to become Idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to Men to use one another's Wife, and to the Women, to choose them others besides their Husband, to beget them with Child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Supra sect. 4. cap. 1. loco ad Rom. 7. 23.

Theod. l. 9. de curandis affect. Graecorum.

The Scythians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawful to bury with them the best beloved Wives: as also they have many other customs remembred by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

Acosta.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Laws some Men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another Man's destruction: that Injury is not done to him that is willing; to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural Laws, either out of St. Augustine, or Aquinas (the one calling it the impression of divine Light; the other, the dictate or sentence of practick Reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For, such is the Law of Nature to the Mind, as the Eye is to the Body; and that which, according to David, sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternal life; though of themselves not sufficient without Faith and Grace.

Nemo jure naturae cum alterius detrimento locupletior fieri debet.

Psal. 4.

Now, that which is truly and properly the Law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of God's divine light in Men, and a participation of the Law increated and eternal. For without any Law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledg of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God and distribution of right to Men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) which have not the Law, do by nature those things contained in the Law: they having not the Law, are a Law unto themselves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all Men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest Reason; in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of Conscience hath made her resting-place and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

Rom. 2. 11.

Rom. 2. 11.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a Law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the World by the advantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt Hearts from the World's Eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite Eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the World, Sed Flos ille, dum loquimur, arescit: Those Flowers whither, while we discourse of their Colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearful Witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden Precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum; maximè omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foul or dishonest, saith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own Heart; but above all Men, reverence thine own Conscience. And this may be a Precept of Nature and right Reason; by which Law, Men and all Creatures, and Bodies, are inclined to those Operations, which are answerable to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable Mind is the form of Man, so is he aptly moved to those things which his proper form presenteth unto him; to wit, that which right Reason offereth; and the Acts of right Reason, are the acts of Vertue; and in the breach of the rules of this Reason, is a Man least excusable; as being a reasonable Creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first Creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in Nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the Herb, which seedeth seed, &c. and the Beast, which liveth thereon. He gave a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds; which they obey. He made a decree for the Rain, and a way for the Lightning of the Thunders. He caused the Sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for signs, and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as Man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once break the Law of their natures and forms; the whole World would then perish, and all return to their first Chaos, darkness, and confusion.

Job c. 28.

By this natural Law, or Law of humane Reason, did Cain perceive his own wickedness and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of Men, it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing was put into our natures by God, and his eternal Law, before the Law written; Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, sin lieth at thy door.

The School-men are large also in this Question of the natural Law; the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this Subject.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of Reason taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practick reason; they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that Good is to be followed, and Evil eschewed) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more universal propositions. Again, as it answereth the natural appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the first, to desire to live, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every Man there are three sorts of Appetites, which answer the three degrees of natural Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, as also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father, after his death, lives in his Children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of Children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable Laws of Nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all Creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as Man is a Being, Ens or Res; so he doth desire good, and shun evil. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to desire their own good. And so is good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil upon the 44. Psalm approveth: Rectè quidem bonum definierant, quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have some Men defined good, or goodness, to be that which all things desire.

The second kind of Appetite, is of those things which appertain unto us, as we have sence. Whence, by the Law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For, as Sense it self is for the preservation of life and being; so is it meet, even by the Law of Nature, that the sensitive Appetite should not carry us to the destruction either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in Beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath given divers Laws unto them: In which sense the Civilians define natural Right, or Jus naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living Creatures: Yet the School-men admit not, that the instincts of Beasts can properly be called a Law, but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every Law. For so they distinguish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living Creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living Creatures in general, from the right belonging to Men; calling the one Jus Naturæ, the other Jus Gentium: the Divines understand the Law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine Reason, both in Beasts and Men; and restrain the Law of Nations to a kind of humane Right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living Creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the Laws of this Appetite are the Commandments of our Religion.

Now, although there are many other branches and divisions of this Law of Nature answering the division of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth; yet is the Law of Nature but one Law, according to Aquinas; first, because it hath one Fountain or Root in the natural or motive Faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this Law of Nature binds all Creatures, it is manifest, and chiefly Man; because he is endued with Reason: in whom as Reason groweth, so this band of observing the Law of Nature increaseth; Basil. Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adveniente mandato, peccatum revixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass which was written by St. Paul, When the commandment came, sin revived. Rom. 7. 9. Neither is it a small warrant for this Law of Nature, when those that break the same, are said by St. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate sense (or mind) to do those things which are not convenient: Rom. 2. 15. And again, that their consciences bear witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For though this Law of Nature stretch not to every particular; as to command fasting, and the like; yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to Right and Reason. And therefore said Damascene; Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to Nature: And St. Augustine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it. L. 2. Fid. ortho. c. 30.

Neither yet are the rules of this Law of Nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For, whereas by this Law, all Men are born Lords of the Earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all Men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of Justice and Equity.

And though the Law of Nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some cases, this her Law she suffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad Man his Weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the Universal principles can no more be changed, than the Decrees of God are alterable: who according to St. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself. 2 Tim. 7.

SECT. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

After the Eternal, and Natural, the Law Positive, or imposed is the next in order, which Law, being nothing but an addition, or rather an explication of the former, hath two kinds; Divine, and Humane. Again, the Divine positive Law is double; the Old, and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai, or Horeb, at such time as the World had stood 2513 whole years: and in the 67 day of this year, when as Ascatades, or Ascades governed the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argives, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430 years. And this, it seems, was the first written Law which the World received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a Law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Græcians; no, not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy eighty years at least; and Troy it self was cast down 335 years after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to engrave in Stone, that it might remain a lasting Book of his expressed Will in the Church: and that the Priests and People might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel though bred among an Idolatrous People in Egypt might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them. Aug. de Civit. Dei. l.

The reason known to us, why this Law was not written before, is, that when the People were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might easily, without any written Law, instruct their own Children; and yet, as they increased, so doubtless they had, besides the Law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, for as much as the Law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular; nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders; nor so expound Divine Worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, ten, and set before the eyes of all Men; which before, they might, but would not, read in their own Consciences. The School-men, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written; whereof these are the chiefest:

The first for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The Law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Souls: The Testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to Children. For, the humane Law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit; but the divine Law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore, by David, it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the Laws of Men can only take knowledg of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words, converting our Souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists; Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of Men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the Mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledg of Truth, which by reason of diversity of Opinion, and difference of peculiar Laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of God bindeth all Men, and is without errour; and therefore also said David, That the Testimony of the Law of God is faithful, giving Wisdom to Children.

SECT. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOw, that in all this long tract of Time, between the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of God were left altogether to the Law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself; and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos; from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea, many particulalar Commandmens afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio; Precepts received from the Mouth of their Priests and Elders; to which the Jews after the Law written, added the interpretation of secret Mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the Divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to their Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The Commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding, they were sufficiently known. For, finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the Ground or Foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain; and Enosh signifieth Man, or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all Fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted, all Men thence-after being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That Murder and Cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood it self, is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all Flesh is come before me; for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold I will destroy them from the Earth.* That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: God's Mercy and Justice interposing between the Untaught and Revenge. This Commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters were dried up from the Earth: Whoso sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed; for in the Image of God hath He made Man.

Also the Law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the Father's curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a Servant of Servants shall he be unto his Brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomite was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from Heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the Law no less detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dina's forcing: and by the judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt; and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken; for she is a Man's Wife. To these we may add the Ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean Beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise up Seed to his Brother that left a Widow Childless, and divers other Constitutions, partly Moral, and partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written Law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called, The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the Hearts of Men, before it was engraven in Stone, but also in substance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For, as St. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew not sin, but by the Law; so ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the Creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten Law; the Angels intuitively; Men, by Reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative Powers; and things Inanimate, by their necessary motions, without sense or perception.

* The common reading is eam terra: but God did not destroy the Earth: And why may not this Proposition in this place have the same force which it hath, according to Junius? Gen. 4. 1. Item. 44 4. & Deut. 34. 1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, ver. 7. Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. Gen. 9. 6. Gen. 9 25. Gen. 34 15. Gen 38. 14.

SECT. IX.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law; with a note prefixed, how the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sence, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOw, as the word [Law] in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain; so the Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by St. Paul diversly; as sometime for the Old Testament; as, Now we know that whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law. Rom. 3.19.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses: For so St. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must be fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms. Luke 24. 44.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial; as, Therefore we conclude, that a Man is justified by Faith, without the works of the Law. Rom. 3.28.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of God's wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the Law, and Summum Jus: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace. Rom. 6.4. Gal. 3.18.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or Signs are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like; then it signifieth but shadows and figures; as, The Law was given by Moses, but Grace and Truth came by Jesus Christ. John 1.17.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ's coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jews Common-wealth; as, Before Faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the Order and Institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed. Gal. 3.23. Luke 16.6. Heb. 7.12. & 10.1.

The word [Law] is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of Life, the Law, or the force of sin and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c. Rom. 8.2. Rom. 7.23.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of Men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holiness and Justice, promising eternal life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the Law, and threatning Death to those which break the Law in the least. For, according to St. James, Whosoever shall keep the whole Law, and fail in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the School-men, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex divina est, divinum decretum, hominibus præscribens modum necessarium, ut aptè pervenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humanæ vitæ finis; the divine Law (say they) is the Decree of God, prescribing unto Men a necessary mean, whereby they may aptly attain supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of Man's Life. James 2. 10.

The Law of Moses hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the Law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral Law entreateth of Vertue and Goodness; the Ceremonial of divine Service, and of Holiness; (for external Worship, and the order of hallowing our selves unto God, is called Ceremony) and the Judicial teacheth the particular Government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for Justice and Equity. And therefore was it said of St. Paul, the Commandment is just, holy, and good: Just, or Justice being referred to Judicial: Holy, or Holiness to the Ceremonial; Good, or honest, to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the Government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons. Rom. 7.12.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong Beasts, and the Fruits of the Earth; to Holy things, the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certain Meats, as not to eat the Blood and fat of Beasts; or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, anointings, and attire; as not to wear mix'd Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnatural and unproper commixtion; as, Thou shalt not yoak together in a Plough an Ox and an Ass, or cast mingled Seed in one Field. It also exhorteth to natural compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty, even to Beasts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the Creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to Man. For so some refer these Precepts, Thou shalt not kill the Bird sitting on her Nest, nor beat down the Buds of the Tree, nor muzzle the Labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respect the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Moral liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away; saving in the ability of justifying or condemning: for therein are we commanded to love and worship God; and to use charity one towards another; which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done; which power of directing by special Rules and Precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial also lived in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it self is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; although in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a far less degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Judicial liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the natural and universal Equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of Justification, the Ceremonial as touching the use and external observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the Ceremonies were signs and shadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-weal and Policy.

SECT.

SECT. X.

A Proposal of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

AS for that which remaineth in general consideration of the divine Written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The sence and understanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three Attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver is approved in all his creatures; who, as he hath given all things their lives and beings, so he only gave the Law, who could onely give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of Mankind; but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the Acts, He gave the Law by the Ordinance of Angels. Gal. 3. 19.

3. The Propriety and Peculiarity of the People receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and dissevered. Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the Promise they were, for the Promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed; not unto his seeds, as to Esau and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now, to Abraham and his seed was the Promise made; he saith not, to the seeds, as speaking of many; but, to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ. Gal. 3. 16.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine; that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandments received by Moses in the Worlds year, 2514. continued to the Baptism of John; from which time, began the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of our Justification; but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in Ceremonies, and a preparation to Righteousness in moral Precepts. For through the Passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World: and therefore S. Paul calleth the Rudiments of the Law, beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no Grace; weak, as not able to forgive and justifie. The bloud of Goats and Bulls, and the Ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christs bloud, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could justifie, then Christ died in vain. Gal. 4. Heb. 9. Gal. 8.

SECT. XI.

Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

THe old and new Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by Works, the new by Grace; but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree; which is, mans happiness and salvation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witness of Gods Will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witness. Yet the New is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate, the ways of our Redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith, the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderful miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable; but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for ever during. Heb. 8. 13.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is of the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad-tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or Story of the Apostles, are plentiful Interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad-tidings in general, as in Esay 52. v. 7. concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signifie that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luke 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ; and so we understand the four Gospels. Acts 1.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the Doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Daneus comprised in these four.

In their Author.
In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.
In the foundation, to wit, Christ.
In the Effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and Will of God in substance of Doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant and Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old Law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ; the old proprosing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one and the same end, even the salvation of of our Souls; which, according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the Law, an earthly Kingdom, a Land flowing with Milk and Honey, the propagation of Children, and other worldly blessings; yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers, notwithstanding these worldy goods, did yet acknowledge themselves stranges, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Jerusalem; according to this place of the Hebrews; All these died in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them afar off, and believed them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also S. Augustine, Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena, æterna promitti; Few (saith he) do understand the old Law; not attending that by things earthly, eternal are promised. And S. Jerom; Noluit Deus pascere Judæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Judæi somniant; God would not feed the Jews as beasts with corporal gifts and riches, as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the future; to wit, the safety of their Souls. For as God created both Body and Soul, so hath he of his goodness, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

Cap. 11. v. 13.

Lib. de Civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 15.

In Sophon. c. 3. v. 9.

The agreement between the old and new Testament in substance, infers also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the Law laid by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the Promises of God in the old and new, are assured: the Fathers having eaten the same spiritual food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is, in that the knowledge of our sin and misery, which is taught us by the Law, maketh way, and, as it were, serveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and salvation; to which the Law serving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and salvation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise, if we sever the Law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different; the one sheweth the way of Righteousness by Works, the other by Faith; the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth; the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth; Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The old restrained the hand, the new, the mind. Data est lex quæ non sanaret (saith S. Augustine) sed quæ ægrotantes proharet; The Law was given, not to help, but to discover sickness: and S. Chrysostom; Data est Lex, ut se homo inveniret; non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quæreretur; The Law was given, that man might find and know his own imperfection; not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seek out the Physician. For Christ came to save the World, which the Law had condemned. And as Moses was but a Servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril; for this Law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

Heb. 7.

SECT. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

THe seventh Consideration is of the end, and use of the Law; which is, to bring us to Christ; for finding no righteousness in our own works, we must seek it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end; the next and proper end of the Law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he that continueth not in all the things of this Law.

Lev. 18. 5.

The second end of the Law, is, to render us inexcusable before God; who knowing so perfect a Law, do not keep it; the Law requiring a perfect and entire, not a broken or half obedience; but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the Law, is, as hath been said, to send us to Christ, and his Grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the Law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and feaful tempest, threatning eternal death.

The fourth end of the Law was to design, and preserve the place of the Church and true People of God; and to hold men in one Discipline, and aw, till the coming of Christ; after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole World.

These be the ends of the Moral Law. The end and use of the Ceremonial Law, is to confirm the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The use of the Judicial, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we must conform our selves.

The sence and understanding of the Law is double, literal, and spiritual: by the literal, we are taught the worship and service of God; by the spiritual, the figures and mystical fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being until the Passion of Christ; before which time, and while Christ taught in the World, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true Sacrifice was offered upon the Altar of the Cross, then the Jewish Sacrifices and Ceremonies, which were Types and Figures of Christ (Christ being the Body of those shadows) ceased to bind the conscience any longer; the mystery of our Redemption being now by Christ, and in him, finished. In token whereof the veil of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the Ceremonial veils and shadows were now to be removed, not that the Moral Law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakned at all; otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the observing of the Law was by Christ himself severely commanded; our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much rejoyced, as he preferred the observation of the Law before all that the World could yield. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy Law, as in all manner of riches: And again, The Law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the love of God (saith S. John) that we keep his Commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the Law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it, that we may do it? Neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws, that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it said in vain in S. Matthew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva mandata; If thou wilt enter unto life, keep the Commandments; and in S. John, Scio quia mandatum ejus vita æterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments; certainly, he is but a lyar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the word of his Will, with all his Power. And, though I confess it not in mans ability, without the special grace of God, to fulfil the Law (Christ only as man excepted) yet, if we rightly consider the merciful care which God had of his people in those his Commandments, we shall find in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chains of obedience, to which the Word of God, and Divine Reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) proposeth to it self. For, this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 Joh. 5. 12. and if we examine every Precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to judge, by what ease perswasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

Cap. 9. 17. Cap. 12. 50

SECT. XIII.

Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue; and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

FOr by the first, we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we enticed to the breach of this Precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceive and know, than an Infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this Almighty Unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute Beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his Providence he hath also provided for every of them, Which giveth to Beasts their food, &c. there is no doubt, but they would also serve and love him onely.

Psa. 149. 9.

The second Precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images; the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true; Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue; until (saith Lactantius) the Devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant Souls, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serve himself thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blind, deaf, dumb, and dead stocks, more worthless than the most worthless of those, that having life and reason, implore their help, which have neither; yea, of more vile price and baser, than the basest of Beasts, who have sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisdom of Solomon) but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journeys of him that cannot go, and success in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the Block to which he prayeth, be more senseless, David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like unto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

Wisd. 13. v. 19.

The branch of the third Commandment, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit; the two greatest inchanters of mortal men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, unless the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an advantage. For, as our corruptest nature gives us nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custom hath the Devil brought up among men, without all subtilty of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornful advantage over us. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft gives satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to covetousness; but this contemptuous offence of Blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of Gods Name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the World do not use it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the Labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And, that this Law was imposed on Man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the Law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shall rest, that thine Ox, and thine Ass may rest, and the Son of thy Maid, and the Stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table, to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which Nature it self hath taught us towards them, who, after God, gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cherished us in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in Temporal and Judicial Ordinances, cursing of Parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, That thou shalt not Murther, that is, Thou shalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the Law of God, and after it, our own Laws, and, in effect, the Law of all Nations, have made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit Murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his own will.

The third of the second Table, commands us from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginity have been possible for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages have mastered their fleshly desires, and have returned chaste to their Grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and injury, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing Marriage is permitted by the Laws of God and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the desire of beauty and form hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill, did not himself give suck to this Infant, and nourish warmth, till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

Nuptiæ replent terram, Virginitas Paradisum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, That we shall not steal. And, if that kind of violent robbery had been used in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a-days in England, and, to the dishonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the World among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by Death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For, I speak not of the poor and miserable Souls, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth; but of those detested Thieves, who, to maintain themselves Lord-like, Assault, Rob, and Wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring-Man; or break by violence into other Mens Houses, and spend in Bravery, Drunkenness and upon Harlots, in one day, what other Men have sometime laboured for all their lives; impoverishing whole Families, and taking the Bread and Food from the Mouths of their Children. And that this Commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear, it Princes would resolve, but for a few years, to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-hounds. And if every Man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-Wealth, but these Men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which, if Men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially, in matters criminal, that the Law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falshood to lay on his Brother.

The last of the ten Commandments, forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another Man, either the bodies of their Wives for concupiscence, or their goods for the desire of gain. And this Precept seemeth the hardest for Men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our frail affections; and yet, if we judg hereof rightly, it may be doubted, whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies, and vain thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther encrease, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for Grace. How the word Coveting, reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For, Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrænatus habendi appetitus: An unbridled, or unrestrained Appetite of having: And, as touching such an Appetite, we cannt excuse our selves by any our natural frailty, or unadvised error; But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort; which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations, are imperfect Acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper Principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quamdiu refragamur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eis dominari permittimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some, that they hurt us not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to bear sway. But these Men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth Precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it break not out into act, is forbidden; therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held; that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For, even so the Moral Philosopher can tell us, that the continent Man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right Reason) as, on the other side, the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, when they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the continent Man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridled his evil desires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them; yet, such a Man according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous Man. For Aristotle himself makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree unto it; confessing, that though the Continent Man do well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent Man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a Virtuous Man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Only in this we excel him here; that we are able out of Divinity, to give the true reason of this Doctrine; which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the Continent Man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witness our love toward himself; we may not safely give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is Justice it self) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to to keep. For, as he is accursed (saith St. Hierom) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is he that saith, that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weakness also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no Man Just, David witnesseth: Enter not into Judgment with thy Servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no Man that sinneth not; And again, Who can say, I have made my Heart clean? But, seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation; let every Man's Conscience judg him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can, yea, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the subject, neglecting the same, seek to satisfie his Sovereign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be derided therein.

SECT.

SECT. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were moſt neceſſary to be obſerved.

AND if we conſider adviſedly, and ſoberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moſes gave unto his People, it will appear, that ſuch was his merciful Providence in the choice of them, as, were there neither pain nor profit adjoined to the obſerving, or not obſerving of them; were there no Divine Power at all, nor any Religion among Men; yet, if we did not for our own ſakes ſtrive to obſerve theſe Laws, all Society of Men, and all endeavours, all happineſs and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every State and Common-weal in the World fall to the ground and diſſolve. Therefore the Laws were not impoſed as a burthen, but as a bleſſing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every Man might enjoy the Fruits of his own tarvel, that Right might be done to all Men, from all Men: that by Juſtice, Order, and Peace, we might live the lives of reaſonable Men, and not of Beaſts; of Free-men, and not of Slaves; of Civil Men, and not of Salvages. And hereof making our humane Reaſon only Judg, let us ſee the inconveniencies in this life, which would follow by the breach and neglect of theſe Laws.

As firſt, what would the iſſue be, if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a far greater Hatred, Warr and Blood-ſhed follow, than that which the difference of Ceremony, and diverſity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among thoſe Nations which acknowledg one God, and one Chriſt?

And what could it profit Mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loſs of time, and an impoſſibility to receive thence-from, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this diſadvantage, and ill to Man, that whoſoever taketh the Name of God in vain, ſhall not at any time benefit himſelf by calling God to witneſs for him, when he may juſtly uſe his Holy Name.

The obſerving the Sabbath Holy, giveth reſt to Men and Beaſts, and Nature her ſelf requireth intermiſſion from labour.

If we deſpiſe our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our Children to ſcorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If Murther were not forbidden, and ſeverely puniſhed, the race of mankind would be extinguiſhed; and whoſoever would take the liberty to deſtroy others, giveth liberty to others to deſtroy himſelf.

If Adultery were lawful, and permitted, no Man could ſay unto himſelf; This is my Son: there would be no Inheritance proper, no Honour deſcend to Poſterity, no endeavour by vertue and undertaking to raiſe Families; Murthers and Poiſonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed; and every Man ſubject to moſt filthy and unclean Diſeaſes.

If Stealth and violent Rapine were ſuffered, all Mankind would ſhortly after periſh, or live as the Salvages, by Roots and Acorns. For no Man laboureth but to enjoy the Fruits thereof. And ſuch is the miſchief of Robbery, as where Moſes for leſſer crimes appointed Reſtitution four-fold, Policy of State, and Neceſſity, hath made it death.

To permit falſe Witneſſes, is to take all Mens lives and eſtates from them by corruption; the Wicked would ſwear againſt the Vertuous; the Waſter againſt the Wealthy; the idle Begger and Loyterer, againſt the careful and painful Labourer; all trial of Right were taken away, and Juſtice thereby baniſhed out of the World.

The coveting of that which belongs to other Men, bringeth no other profit than a diſtraction of Mind, with an inward vexation; for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitleſs hopes, ſo long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the deſire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives, or Goods of our Neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our ſelves ſhall alſo, either by theft or by ſtrong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of God's Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in reſpect of himſelf, did the moſt merciful and provident God ordain them; without the obſervation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the Earth, with all the bleſſings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no uſe. For we ſhould remain but in the ſtate of brute Beaſts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

SECT. XV.

Of humane Law, written, and unwritten.

HUmane Law, of which now it followeth to ſpeak, is firſt divided into two, (viz.) Written, and unwritten. The unwritten conſiſts of Uſage, approved by time; which Iſidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores to be Conſuetudines vetuſtate probatæ; to be Cuſtoms approved by Antiquity, or unwritten Laws. Now Cuſtom differeth from Uſe, as the cauſe from the effect; in that Cuſtom is by uſe and continuance eſtabliſhed into a Law; but yet there, where the Law is defective, ſaith Iſidore.

And of Cuſtoms there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars; the firſt are written Cuſtoms, received, and exerciſed by Nations, as the Cuſtoms of Burgundy and Normandy, the antient general Cuſtom of England, and the Cuſtoms of Caſtile, and other Provinces.

The ſecond are theſe petty Cuſtoms, uſed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National Cuſtoms are ſome written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty Cuſtoms are ſeldom written, but witneſſed by teſtimony of the Inhabitants. The Cuſtom of the Dutchy of Cornwal, comprehending alſo the Stannary of Devon, as touching Tinn, and Tinn Cauſes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwal. But howſoever, uſe and time hath made theſe Cuſtoms as Laws, yet ought every Cuſtom to be rationabilis, as well as præſcripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non ſubſiſtit; That which at firſt was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (ſaith Ulpian) quod ab initio vicioſum eſt, non poteſt tractu temporis convaleſcere; Courſe of time amends not that which was naught from from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all Laws of Custom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the Law Divine, and Natural; the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance; it being manifest that every Custom which is against the Law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature, were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they have been since continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort over-ruled in the Law; Per populum Consuetudo contra Legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui novam Legem & novam Constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The People cannot bring in a new custom against Law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new Law and Ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane Law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practick Reason; by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common Precept, the advisement of wise Men, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law, a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for government and common profit; And more largely, Omne id quod ratione constitit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural and eternal, made by the rational discourse of those that exercise publick Authority; prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying, Mihi Lex esse non videtur, quæ justa non fuerit; It seems to be no Law at all to me, which is not just: and just it cannot be, except it agree with the Law natural and eternal. For there is no Law just and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil justum atque Legitimum est, quod non ab æterna Lege sibi homines derivaverunt.

Lib. 1. de li. arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of Reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law natural, to wit, the natural, demonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the Law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorised Magistracy, it cannot be doubted, be the Government of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the title of those Decrees called Violentiæ, or iniquæ Constitutiones; Violence, or wicked Constitutions.

4. Parts.

Of humane Law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawn out of the Law of Nature; so every particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publick Authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth and directeth all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For, according to Thomas, Alia Lex Julia de Adulteriis, alia Cornelii de Sicariis; The Law of Julian against Adultery, is one; the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now, the humane Law generally taken, is in respect of these considerations, divided into the Law of Nations, and the Civil.

The Law of Nations is taken less or more properly; less properly for every Law which is not of it self, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Ulpian understands it: for he defineth Jus Gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst Men, as Religion, and the Worship of God; which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted between enemies, &c. Which National Law, according to divers acceptations, and divers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Natural, sometime of the Humane.

Jus Civile, or the Civil Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers Estates it is also divers and peculiar; and this Law is not so immediately derived from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For, it is partly deduced out of such principles, as all Nations do not agree in, or easily assent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and do not fit all Estates. Hereof Ulpian, Jus Civile neque in totum à Naturali & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit: itaque cum aliquid addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id est, Civili efficimus; The Civil Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it; therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Civil Law. In Leg. 6. to. ff. de Justitia. jur.

The Law now commonly called the Civil Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decemviri, 303 years after the Foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian and other Grecian Laws, as out of the antient Roman Customs and Laws Regal. The Regal Laws were devised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, because they were gathered by Papyrius, Traquin then reigning. For, though so many of the former Laws as maintained Kingly Authority, were abolished with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common Utility, were continued, and were a part of the Laws of the twelve Tables. To these Laws of the twelve Tables, were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus consulta: those of the common People, called Plebei-scita, those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum; and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate; which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperor, they were by him confirmed, and made perpetual Laws, and the Volume styled, Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like collections of Justinian afterward were. Dion. Hal. C. Signon. l. 1. our of Pomponius.

The difference antiently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Laws are the Constitutions made or confirmed by Soveraign Authority (be the Soveraignty in the People, in a few, or in one) and are withal general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Jussum Magistratus, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, Legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most to an Edict, say that it is a Law for one year: Though Isidore doth also express by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as, Constitutio, vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain, or proclaim.

Lastly, the humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiastical, or Canon. The Secular lar commanding temporal good, to wit, the Peace and Tranquillity of the Common-weal; the Eccleſiaſtical, the ſpiritual good, and right government of the Eccleſiaſtical Common-wealth, or Church: Illud naturæ legem, hoc divinam ſpectat; That reſpecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And ſo may Jus Civile be taken two ways; Firſt, as diſtinguiſhed from the Law of Nations, as in the firſt diviſion: Secondly, as it is the ſame with the Secular, and diverſe from the Eccleſiaſtical. But this diviſion of the School-men is obſcure. For although the Civil be the ſame with the Secular, as the Civil is a Law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other Laws not Eccleſiaſtical. For, of Secular Laws in uſe among Chriſtian Princes, and in Chriſtian Common-weals, there are three kinds; the Civil, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Chriſtian Eſtates (England excepted) moſt powerful; the Laws of England, called Common, and the Laws of Cuſtom, or Provincial. In Spain, beſides the Law Civil, they have the Cuſtoms of Caſtile, and other Provinces. In France, beſides the Civil, the Cuſtoms of Burgundy, Bloys, Berri, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous liez ſitues & aſſis en Lodunois, ſeront governez ſelon les Cuſtumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, ſhall be governed according to the Cuſtoms of that place. There are alſo in France the Cuſtoms of Normandy, and theſe of two kinds, General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Eſtates. The Charters of confirmation of theſe antient Cuſtoms, before and ſince their reformation have theſe words: Nos autem Regiſtrum prædictum, uſus laudabiles, & Conſuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Regiſter aforeſaid, laudable uſe, and antient cuſtoms, we praiſe, approve, and by our Kingly Authority confirm. The Common-Law of England is alſo compounded of the antient Cuſtoms of the ſame, and of certain Maxims by thoſe Cuſtoms of the Realm approved. Upon which Cuſtoms alſo are grounded thoſe Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other ſmall Courts.

Art. 3. tit. 5. G. Cuſt.

Theſe antient Cuſtoms of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from Age to Age: as that Cuſtom by which no man ſhall be taken, impriſoned, diſſeiſed, nor otherwiſe deſtroy'd, but he muſt firſt be put to anſwer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the antient Cuſtom of England, that the eldeſt Sons ſhould inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elſewhere otherwiſe, and by partition. In Ireland, it is the Cuſtom of all Lands (that have not been reſigned into the Kings hands) that the eldeſt of the Houſe ſhall enjoy the Inheritance during his own life; and ſo the ſecond and third eldeſt (if there be ſo many Brothers) before the Heir in lineal deſcent; this is called the Cuſtom of Tanijtry. For example, if a Lord of Land have four Sons, and the eldeſt of thoſe four have alſo a Son, the three Brothers of the eldeſt Son, after the death of their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-child: the Cuſtom being grounded upon the reaſon of neceſſity. For the Iriſh in former times, having always lived in a ſubdivided Civil War, nor onely the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but every Baron and Gentleman one againſt another, were enforc'd to leave Succeſſors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now, as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar and petty Cuſtoms, beſides the great and general Cuſtom of the Land, ſo are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greateſt bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament; Laws propounded and approved by the three Eſtates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which, all men are therefore bound, becauſe they are Acts of choice, and ſelf-deſire. Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent, quàm quòd judicio Populi receptæ ſunt; The Laws do therefore bind the Subject, becauſe they are received by the judgment of the Subject. Tum demum humanæ Leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modò inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmitæ approbatione Communitatis; It is then that humane Laws have their ſtrength, when they ſhall not onely be deviſed, but by the approbation of the People confirmed.

Vlp. ff. de Leg. Leg. 32.

Aug. de vera relig. cap. 31. Gratian. in dec. diſt. 4. Cum in iſtis.

Iſidore faſneth theſe properties to every Chriſtian Law, that the ſame be honeſt, that it be poſſible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the cuſtom of the Countrey; alſo for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifeſt; and without reſpect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He alſo gives four effects of the Law, which Modeſtinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and inſtigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid Vice; the latter encourageth with hope, to follow Vertue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum: It behooveth the Law to be a mender of Vices, and a commender of Vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the obſervation of things commanded, or forbidden, is an effect common to all Laws; and it is two-fold: the one conſtraineth us by fear of our conſciences, the other by fear of external puniſhment. Theſe two effects the Law performeth, by the exerciſe of thoſe two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The ſecond of theſe two effects remembred by Modeſtinus, is Inſtigation, or incouragement to Vertue, as Ariſtotle makes it the end of the Law, to make men vertuous. For Laws being ſuch as they ought to be, do both by preſcribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing; laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchaſed. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are thoſe into which the Law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and ſubſtance thereof: ſaying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum, Decline from evil, and do good.

Pſal. 37.

SECT. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what ſort.

NOw, whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any perſon, it is doubtfully diſputed among thoſe that have written of this ſubject, as well Divines as Lawyers; and namely, whether Soveraign Princes be compellable, yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforeſaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be ſubject, but not to that which conſtraineth. For, as touching violence, or puniſhments, no man is bound to give a prejudicial judgment againſt himſelf; and, if equals have not any power over each other, much leſs have inferiours over their ſuperiours, from whom they receive their authority and ſtrength.

And ſpeaking of the ſupreme power of Laws; ſimply then is the Prince ſo much above the Laws, as the Soul and Body united, is above a dead and ſenſleſs Carkaſs. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum, & Lex animata: An animate, and living Law. But this is true, that by giving authority to Laws, Princes both add greatneſs to themſelves, and conſerve it; and therefore was it ſaid of Bracton out of Juſtinian; Meritò debet Rex tribuere legi quod Lex attribuit ei: nam Lex facit ut ipſe ſit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the Law, which the Law firſt attributeth to the King; for it is the Law that doth make Kings.

Bract. l. 2.

But whereas Bracton aſcribeth this power to the humane Law, he is therein miſtaken. For Kings are made by God, and Laws divine; and by humane Laws onely declared to be Kings. As for the places remembred by the Divines and Lawyers, which infer a kind of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conſcience, and profit ariſing from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an accompt of their actions to God onely.

Pſalm 50. Aff. de Leg.

Tibi ſoli peccavi, ſaith David; againſt thee onely have I ſinned; therefore the Prince cannot be ſaid to be ſubject to the Law: Princeps non ſubjicitur Legi. For ſeeing, according to the School-men, the Law humane, is but quoddam organum, & inſtrumentum poteſtatis gubernativæ: non videtur poſſe ejus obligatio ad eum ſe extendere, ad quem ipſa vis poteſtatis humanæ non pertinet; ſed vis poteſtatis humanæ non ſe extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa reſidet. Ergo, neque Lex condita per talem poteſtatem obligari poteſt ipſum conditorem; Omnis enim potentia activa, eſt principium tranſmutandi aliud: Seeing humane Law (ſay they) is but a kind of Organ, or Inſtrument of the Power that governeth, it ſeems that it cannot extend it ſelf to bind any one, whom no humane power can control, or lay hold of: but the Governour himſelf, in whom the governing power doth reſide, is a perſon that cannot by himſelf, or by his own power, be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by ſuch a power, cannot bind the Law-maker himſelf: for every active ability, is a cauſe or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it ſelf reſides. And ſeeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the Law; Ergo, etiam poteſt ipſemet Princeps, ſive Legiſlator ſua ſe voluntate pro libito ab obligatione Legis liberare; Therefore alſo may a Prince, or Law-maker, at his own will and pleaſure, deliver himſelf from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur Leges obſervare neceſſitate coactionis; Princeps vero ſola voluntate ſua, & intuitu boni communis; The ſubjects are bound to fulfil the Law by neceſſity of compulſion; but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Greg. Valentia de Leg.

Now, concerning the Politick Laws, given by Moſes to the Nation of the Iſraelites, whether they ought to be a Preſident, from which no civil Inſtitutions of other People ſhould preſume to digreſs, I will not preſume to determine, but leave it as a queſtion for ſuch men to decide, whoſe profeſſions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, That we ought not to ſeem wiſer than God himſelf, who hath told us, that there are no Laws ſo righteous, as thoſe which it pleaſed him to give to his Elect People to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their ſeveral qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no leſs than in their peculiar Languages; which diſagreeable conditions to govern aptly, one and the ſame Law very hardly were able. The Roman Civil Law did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after ſuch time as once it was received and become familiar; yet was not the adminiſtration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural Cuſtoms of the ſundry people which it governed. For, whether it be through a long continued perſwaſion; or (as Aſtrologers more willingly grant) ſome influence of the Heavens; or, peradventure, ſome temper of the ſoil and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty make the Sybarites luxurious; want, and opportunity to ſteal, makes the Arabians to be Thieves) very hard it were to forbid by Law, an offence ſo common with any people, as it wanted a name whereby to be diſtinguiſhed from juſt and honeſt. By ſuch rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Chriſtian Religion, which it willingly at the firſt imbraced, but after, with great fury rejected, becauſe plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how neceſſarily, but more conſcientiouſly than ſeaſonably. In ſuch caſes, methinks it were not amiſs to conſider, that the high God himſelf permitted ſome things to the Iſraelites, rather in regard of their natural diſpoſition (for they were hard-hearted) than becauſe they were conſonant unto the antient Rules of the firſt perfection. So, where even the general Nature of Man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjuſt; there may the Law, given by Moſes, worthily be deemed the moſt exact reformer of the evil, which forceth Man, as near as may be, to the will and pleaſure of his Maker. But where Nature or Cuſtom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with ſo long and ſo publick approbation, that the vertue oppoſing it would ſeem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the Engliſh faſhion of apparel in Turkie; there may a wiſe and upright Law-giver, without preſumption, omit ſomewhat that the rigour of Moſes Law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter meerly Eccleſiaſtical, and therefore the leſs capable of diſpenſation, praying for the people; The good Lord be merciful unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to ſeek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleanſed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which Prayer the Lord heard and granted. 2 Chron. 30. 18, 19.

To this effect it is well obſerved by Mr. Doctor Willet, that the moral Judicials of Moſes do partly bind, and partly ſet free. They do not bind affirmatively, that we are tied to the ſame ſeverity of puniſhment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the puniſhment of death ſhould not be adjudged, where ſentence of death is given by Moſes; Chriſtian Magiſtrates ruling under Chriſt the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the ſeverity of Moſes Law, and mitigate the puniſhment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burthen more heavy: for to ſhew more rigour than Moſes, becometh not the Goſpel. Iſai. 9.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the ſubject of many learned diſcourſes, neither will I take upon me, to ſpeak any thing definitively in a caſe which dependeth ſtill in ſome controverſie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly ſay, that the defence of it hath always been very plauſible. And ſurely, howſoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and onely Law; yet ſhall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conſcience of a Judge may reſt, with equal ſatisfaction in making interpretation, or giving ſentence upon doubts ariſing out of any Law beſides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been witneſs, of whom Forteſcue, that notable Bulwark of our Laws, doth ſpeak, complaining of a judgment given againſt a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accuſed by her own man, without any other proof, for murthering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, ned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a year after, being convict for the same offence, confest that his Mistress was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented; but this Judge, saith

Cap. 5. 3. the same Author, Sæpius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to clear his conscience of that fact. Wherefore, that acknowledgment which other Sciences yield unto the Metaphysicks, that from thence are drawn Propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politick Institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysicks, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is Being; is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The Being of Beings, the only Good, the fountain of Truth, whose fear is the beginning of Wisdom. To which purpose, well saith S. Augustine, Conditor Legum temporalium si vir bonus est, & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit æternam, de quâ nulli animæ judicare datum est; The Author of temporal Laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternal, to determine of which, there is no power given to any Soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his Discourse, Nemo potest melius, aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quàm posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moses.

SECT. I.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the Worship of God, in this ordering of their Troops.

WHen Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the People, and finished the Tabernacle of the Ark, and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel; and having seen what number of Men, fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe, from twenty years of age and upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550 able men for the Wars, besides Women and Children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four gross and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400 able Men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their number, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulun. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Naasson; in Issachar, 54400 led by Nathaniel; in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vaunt-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general encamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures, the host of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simeon and Gad, in number, 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500 under Elizur; in Simeon, 59300 under Shelumiel; Gad, 45650 under Eliasaph: These had the second place, and encamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joyned the Regiment of Manasseh and Benjamin; who joyned together, made in number, 108100 able men. These marched in the third place, encamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500 under Elishama; Manasseh 32200 under Gamaliel; Benjamin 35400 under Abidan.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600 able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, encamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700 under Ahiezer; Asher 41500 under Pagiel; Nephtali 53400 under Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and insurrection against Moses; Numb. 16. vers. 1, and 2. For there arose up against Moses 250 Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown; of which number were Korah, Dathan and Abiram. Which three principal Mutineers, with those 250 Captains that followed them, were not any of the Princes of the Tribes or general Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Numb. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the Land of Promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them under their several Standards in the Wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedency, and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Leah, Jacob's Wife. Reuben having lost his birthright, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had under-gone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the Son of his Mothers Handmaid. Joseph, who, in temporal blessings, had the prerogative of the first-born, a double portion, was accompted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments; the younger (according to Jacob's propheey) taking place before the elder, he was assisted by by Benjamin, his beſt beloved brother, the other ſon of Rachel. To Dan, the eldeſt ſon of Jacob's Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacob's prophecy. He had with him under his Standard, none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the ſons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of theſe four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, ſurrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reaſon of theſe four powerful Armies which guarded the ſame; ſo was it death for any of the children of Iſrael to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So ſacred was the moveable Temple of God, and with ſuch reverence guarded and tranſported, as 22000 perſons were dedicated to the ſervice and attendance thereof, of which 8580 had the peculiar charge, according to their ſeveral Offices and Functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the People obſerved the former order in their incampings: ſo did the Levites quarter themſelves, as in an inner ſquare, on every ſide of the Tabernacle; the Geſhurites on the Weſt, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliaſaph commanded, in number 7500. The Family of Kohath on the South-ſide, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third Company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200, and theſe were lodged on the North-ſide, within the Army of Dan. On the Eaſt-ſide, and next within thoſe Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moſes and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the firſt and immediate Commanders, both of Ceremonies, and of the People; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical Families, was Eleazar, the ſon of Aaron, his ſucceſſor in the high Prieſthood.

This was the order of the Army of Iſrael, and of their encamping and marching; the Tabernacle being always ſet in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care which Moſes the Prophet and choſen ſervant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and leaſt parts of the Tabernacle, Ark, and Sanctuary, witneſſed well the inward and moſt humble zeal born towards God himſelf. The induſtry uſed in the framing thereof, and every and the leaſt part thereof; the curious workmanſhip thereon beſtowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the proviſions, the dutiful obſervance in the laying up, and preſerving the holy Veſſels; the ſolemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the ſame, which all Ages have in ſome degree imitated, is now ſo forgotten and caſt away in this ſuper-fine Age, by thoſe of the Family, by the Anabaptiſt, Browniſt, and other Sectaries, as all coſt and care beſtowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be ſerved and worſhipped, is accompted a kind of Popery, and as proceeding from an Idolatrous diſpoſition; inſomuch as time would ſoon bring to paſs (if it were not reſiſted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields, and Mountains, and under the Hedges, and the Offices of the Miniſtry (robbed of all dignity and reſpect) be as contemptible as thoſe places; all Order, Diſcipline, and Church-government, left to newneſs of Opinion, and mens fancies; yea, and ſoon after, as many kinds of Religions would ſpring up, as there are Pariſh-Churches within England; every contentious and ignorant perſon clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inſomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, ſhall appear to the ſimple multitude, no leſs variable than contrary to it ſelf, the Faith of men will ſoon after die away by degrees, and all Religion be held in ſcorn and contempt. Which diſtraction gave a great Prince of Germany cauſe of this Anſwer to thoſe that perſwaded him to become a Lutheran; Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis: ſi me aliis adjungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, ſed quid ſequar, non habeo: If I adjoyn my ſelf to you, I am condemned by others; If I joyn with others, I am condemned by you: what I ſhould avoid I ſee, but I ſee not what I ſhould follow.

SECT. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Paſſover of the ſecond year: the departing of Jethro.

NOw, when Moſes had taken order for all things neceſſary, provided for the ſervice of God, written the Laws, numbred his Army, and divided them into the Battels and Troups before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all ſorts; The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, ſix covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to tranſport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto, the Sanctuary excepted, which for reverence was carried upon the ſhoulders of the Sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots, in which was conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacle and Veſſels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that ſervice, namely, to the ſons of Gerſhan and Merari. Numb. 6.

Beſides theſe Chariots, each of theſe Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his ſervice in the Temple, a Charger of fine Silver, weighing 130 ſhekels; a ſilver Bowl of 70 ſhekels, after the ſhekel of the Sanctuary; and an Incenſe-Cup of Gold, of ten ſhekels, which they performed at the ſame time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron; and before they marched from Sinai towards their conqueſt, beſides the Beaſts which they offered for ſacrifice, according to the Law Ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve ſilver Chargers, and twelve ſilver Bowls, amounted unto 2400 ſhekels of ſilver; and the weight of gold in the Incenſe-Cups, to 120 ſhekels of gold; which makes of ſhekels of ſilver 1200, every ſhekel of gold valuing ten of ſilver; ſo that the whole of gold and ſilver which they offered at this time, was about four hundred and twenty pound ſterling. This done, Moſes, as in all the reſt, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Paſſover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the ſecond Moneth of the ſecond Year; and on the twentieth day of the ſame, the Cloud was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a ſign of going forward; Moſes beginning his march with this invocation to God: Riſe up, Lord, and let thine enemies be ſcattered; and let them that hate thee, flie before thee. Then all the people of Iſrael removed from their encamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Army, or great ſquadron of Juda, led

The Hebrew Gera's weigheth ſixteen grains: ſo a Gerah of Silver is about three half pence ſterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20 Gerahs, ſo a Sanctuary Sicle of ſilver is about 7 Groats, the common Sicle is but half as much, to wit, 10 Gerahs: as it is uſually expounded; though Vallapandus labours to prove that Numb. 10. 11. Exod. ult. 34. Num. 9. 17.

the common, and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Numb. 9. 5.

led by Naaſhon, taking the Vaunt-guard, followed by Nathaniel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Iſſachar and Zabulon; after whom the reſt marched, as in the Figure expreſs'd. And becauſe the paſſage through ſo many Deſarts and Mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moſes leaving nothing un-forethought, which might ſerve for the advancement of his enterpriſe, he inſtantly intreated his Father-in-Law, whom, in the tenth of Numbers, he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promiſing him ſuch part and profit of the enterpriſe, as God ſhould beſtow on them: for this man, as he was of great underſtanding and judgement (as appeared by the counſel he gave to Moſes for the appointing of Judges over the People) ſo was he a perfect guide in all thoſe parts, himſelf inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it ſeemeth) a man of great years and experience; for he was then the Prieſt or Prince of Madian, when Moſes fled firſt out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42 years before this requeſt made. And though Moſes himſelf had lived 40 years in theſe parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travel; yet the better to aſſure his paſſage, and ſo great a multitude of ſouls, which could not be ſo few as a Million, it was neceſſary to uſe many guides, and many conductors. To this requeſt of Moſes, it may ſeem by the places, Exod. 18.27. and Numb. 10.30. that Jethro, otherwiſe called Hobab, yielded not; for it is evident, that he went back from Moſes into his own Countrey. But becauſe it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the Poſterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Iſraelites, it is moſt likely that this his return to his own Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his own Countrey, by ſetting things in order, than to abide there.

SECT. III.

The Voyage from Horeb to Kades; the Mutinies by the way; and the cauſe of their turning back to the Red Sea.

AFter this diſmiſſion of Hobab, Iſrael began to march towards the deſarts of Paran; and after three days wandring, they ſate down at the Sepulchres of luſt, afterward called Taberra, or Incenſio; by reaſon that God conſumed with fire thoſe Mutineers and Murmurers, which roſe up in this remove, which happened about the 23 day of the ſame Moneth. And from this 23 day of the ſecond Moneth of the ſecond year, they reſted, and fed themſelves with Quails (which it pleaſed God by a Sea-wind to caſt upon them) to the 24 day of the third Moneth; to wit, all the Moneth of Sinan, or June; whereof ſurſeiting, there died great numbers; from whence in the following Moneth, called Thamus, anſwering to our July, they went on to Haſeroth, where Miriam the ſiſter of Moſes was ſtricken with the Leproſie, which continued upon her ſeven days, after whoſe recovery Iſrael removed toward the border of Idumæa, and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moſes ſent the twelve Diſcoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themſelves of the fertility and ſtrength of the Countrey; as alſo to take knowledge of the Ways, Paſſages, Rivers, Fords and Mountains. For Arad, King of the Canaanites, ſurprized divers companies of the Iſraelites, by lying in ambuſh near thoſe ways, through which the Diſcoverers and Searchers of the Land had formerly paſt. Now, after the return of the Diſcoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned againſt Iſrael; whoſe ingratitude and rebellion after his ſo many benefits, ſo many remiſſions, ſo many miracles wrought, was ſuch, as they eſteemed their deliverance from the Egyptian ſlavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderneſs (for ſo Moſes calleth it) with the Victory which he gave them againſt the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on, and preſerved them, but to bring them, their Wives and Children to be ſlaughtered, and given for a prey and ſpoil to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For, it was reported unto them by the Searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many ſtrong Towers and Caſtles, that many of the people were Giant-like (for they confeſs'd that they ſaw the Sons of Anak there) who were men of fearful ſtature, and ſo far over-topped the Iſraelites, as they appeared to them and to themſelves, but as Graſhoppers in their reſpect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the reſt, wherein they both accuſed God, and conſulted to chooſe them a Captain (or as they call it now adays an Electo) to carry them back again into Egypt; ſo did God puniſh the ſame in a greater meaſure, than any of the former. For he extinguiſhed every Soul of the whole multitude (Joſua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promiſes, perſwaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it; and at the mountain foot of Idumæa, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and aſſuring them of Victory. But as men whom the paſſion of fear had bereaved both of reaſon and common ſenſe, they threatned to ſtone theſe encouragers to death; accompting them as men either deſperate in themſelves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God reſiſted theſe wicked purpoſes, and interpoſing the fear of his bright Glory between the unadviſed fury of the Multitude, and the innocency and conſtancy of his Servants, preſerved them thereby from their violence; threatning an entire deſtruction of the whole Nation, by ſending among them a conſuming and mercileſs Peſtilence. For this was the tenth Inſurrection and Rebellion, which they had made, ſince God delivered them from the ſlavery of the Egyptians. But Moſes (the mildeſt or meekeſt of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies; alleging, that this ſo ſevere a judgement, how deſervedly ſoever inflicted, would increaſe the pride of the heathen Nations, and give them occaſion to vaunt, that the God of Iſrael failingin power to perform his Promiſes, ſuffered them to periſh in theſe barren and fruitleſs Deſarts. Yet, as God is no leſs juſt than merciful, as God is ſlow to anger, ſo is his wrath a conſuming fire; the ſame being once kindled by the violent breath of man's ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leſs heavy than hoped for, he ſcourged this iniquity; ſo by the meaſure of his Glory (evermore jealous of neglect and deriſion) he ſuffered not the wicked to paſs unpuniſhed; reſerving his compaſſion for the innocent; whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleaſed to preſerve, and in them to perform his Promiſes, which have never been fruſtrate.

SECT. IV.

Of their unwillingneſs to return; with the puniſhment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOw, when Moſes had revealed the purpoſes of God to the People, and made them know his heavy diſpleaſure towards them, they began to bewail themſelves, though over-late; the times of Grace and mens Repentance having alſo their appointment. And then when God had left them to themſelves, and was no more among them, after they had ſo often plaid and dallied with his merciful ſufferings, they would needs amend their former diſobedience by a ſecond contempt, and make offer to enter the Land, contrary again to the advice of Moſes; who aſſured them that God was not among them; and that the Ark of his Covenant ſhould not move, but by his direction, who could not err; and that the Enemies ſword, which God had hitherto bended, and rebated, was now left no leſs ſharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no leſs cruel. But as men from whom God hath with-drawn his Grace, do always follow thoſe counſels which carry them to their own deſtructions: ſo the Hebrews, after they had forſaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered; and might then have entred Judæa before their Enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrary to Gods Commandment, undertake the enterpriſe of themſelves, and ran head-long, and without advice, into the Mountains of Idumæa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, ſet on them, brake them, and of their numbers ſlaughtered the greateſt part: and following their victory and purſuit, conſumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former loſs and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites, to prevent their diſplantation and deſtruction threatned. Of which powerful aſſembly of thoſe two Nations (aſſiſted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings, joyned together for their common ſafety) it pleaſed God to forewarn Moſes, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by thoſe painful paſſages of the Deſarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the Red Sea again; in which retreat, before they came back to paſs over Jordan, there were conſumed eight and thirty years; and the whole number of the 600 and odd thouſand, which came out of Egypt (Moſes, Joſua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderneſs, the ſtubborn and careleſs generation were wholly worn out, and the promiſed Land beſtowed on their children; which were increaſed to 600000 and more. For, beſides the double fault, both of refuſing to enter the Land upon the return of their Diſcoverers, and the preſumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it ſeemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worſhipping Moloch, and the Hoſt of Heaven. For, although Moſes doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and ſo doth the Martyr Stephen; as alſo that the Iſraelites worſhipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of ſundry other places.

Amos 5. 25 Acts 7. 42. 2 King. 17. 16. & cap. 21. v. 3. & c. 23. v. 4, 5, 11. 2 Chron. 33 3. Jer. 19. v. 13, &c.

Now, after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moſes, according to the Commandmenr received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the ſhoars of the Red Sea. And ſo from Cades, or Rithma, he removed to Remmonparez, ſo called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincenſe there found. From Libnah he croſſed the Valley, and ſate down at Reſſa, near the foot of the Mountain. And after he had reſted there, he bended towards the Weſt, and encamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was ſtoned to death. After which, Moſes always keeping the Valley, between two great ledges of Mountains (thoſe which bound the Deſart of Sin, and thoſe of Pharan) croſs'd the ſame from Ceelata, and marched Eaſtward to the Mountain of Sapher, or Sepher; this making the twentieth Manſion. From thence he paſſed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah, and ſo to Thara, or Thare; the four and twentieth Manſion. Where Moſes reſted, the people began that inſolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who, for their contempt of God and his Miniſters, were ſome of them ſwallowed up alive, and by the earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered Incenſe with Korah, were conſumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700 of their party, which murmured againſt Moſes, ſtricken dead with a ſudden peſtilence: one of the greateſt marvels and judgments of God that hath been ſhewed in all the time of Moſes his Government, or before. For among ſo great a multitude, thoſe lay-men, who would have uſurped Eccleſiaſtical authority, were ſuddenly ſwallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and Goods; even while they ſought to over-throw the Order, Diſcipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliouſly contending againſt the High Prieſt and Magiſtrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Commonweal of his People. And the better to aſſure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleaſeth him in this place alſo to approve by miracle the former election of his ſervant Aaron, by the 12 Rods given by the Heads of the 12 Tribes; of which Moſes received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which, being all withered and dried Wands, and on every Rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi, it pleaſed God, that the Rod of Aaron received, by his power, a vegetable ſpirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Bloſſoms, and ripe Almonds. Numb. 33.

From Tharah, the whole Army removed to Methra; and thence to Eſmona; and thence to Moſeſeroth (or Maſurit, after S. Jerom) and from Moſeroth to Benejacan; and ſo to Gadgad, which Jerom calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Manſion; where, from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adricomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian, and Aſiongaber.

Now, although it be very probable, that at Aſiongaber, where Solomon furniſhed his Fleet for the Eaſt-India, there was ſtore of freſh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the Stony, which he calleth Corys, from whence (ſaith he) the Inhabitants convey water in Pipes of Leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyſes; yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding theſe Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth, or thirtieth Manſion. For it was at Punon, that thoſe Springs are ſpoken of, which in Herod. l. 3.

Deuteronomy

Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also called Jetabata, or Jotbah, a Land of running Waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Asiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh Water in those sandy parts of Arabia; which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and encamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Esiongaber; which City in Josephus time, had the name of Berenice; and in Hieroms, Essia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded; Esiongaber being the fartheſt place towards the South-East, that Moses travelled in that passage. Deut. 2.

It seemeth that Esiongaber, or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, near the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumæa. And if Esiongaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this present been subject unto the Idumæans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained those places; for it is said; And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took Men with them; which were those Companies that followed young Adad of Idumæa into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a Navie of Ships in Esiongaber, besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. Numb. 20. 13. 1 Kings 11. 18.

SECT. V.

Of Moses arrival at Zin Cades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

FRom Esiongabar he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh; or in Beroth, of the Children of Jacan; where the sate down in the first Month of the fortieth Year, after they left Egypt. For, at the next Mansion, Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fortieth Year; the nine and thirtieth Year taking end at Esiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses Sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seen in St. Hieroms time, as himself avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to the Mountain Hor, all the People murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of Water. For neither the punishments by Fire from Heaven; nor being devoured and swallowed up by the Earth by the sudden Pestilence, which often seazed them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites; but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own Fathers had left their Bodies in the Desarts, and they were now entred into the fortieth Year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times; and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoining, with his Rod, and the Waters issued out in great abundance, with which both themselves and their Cattel were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travels of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the garments of his Priesthood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God hath commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen. Numb. 20. 9. 2553.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deut. 10. vers. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumæans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera, which they write Moseroth, for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places; because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esiongaber, encamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he had left Cadas, where Miriam, Moses Sister, died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera, Hor near Mosera; for it is but one Root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are; Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red-Sea on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Moab, as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive. Numb. 33.

Now it was from Cades before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumæa, praying him that he might pass with the People of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neareſt way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now, the better to perswade the Prince of Idumæa hereunto, Moses remembred him, that he was of the same Race and Family with Israel; calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one Father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom, Esau his Ancestor had made Warr, and driven out the Horites (who were of their antient Races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name, Edom, or Idumæa. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes; and promises assured Edom, or the King thereof that he would no way offend his People, or waſte his Country, but that he would reſtrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high-ways, paying Money for whatſoever he uſed, yea, even for the Water which themſelves or their Cattel ſhould drink. For Moſes was commanded by God, not to provoke the Children of Eſau. But the King of Idumæa knowing the ſtrength of his own Countrey, the ſame being near Canaan, rampir'd with high and ſharp Mountains; and withal ſuſpecting, as a natural wiſe Man, that 600000 ſtrangers being once entred his Countrey, it would reſt in their wills to give him Law, reſolvedly refuſed them paſſage, and delivered this anſwer to the Meſſengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and reſiſt them by all poſſible means. And not knowing whether ſuch a denial might ſatisfie or exaſperate, he gathered the ſtrength of his Countrey together, and ſhewed himſelf prepared to defend their paſſage. For, as it is written, Then Edom came out againſt him (to wit, Moſes) with much People, and with a mighty Power. Whereupon Moſes underſtanding, that the end of his enterpriſe was not the conqueſt of Seir, or Idumæa, and that the Land promiſed, was that of Canaan: like unto himſelf, who was of natural underſtanding the greateſt of any Man, and the skilfulleſt Man of War that the World had, he refuſed to adventure the Army of Iſrael againſt a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a paſſage to invade others; and which, by reaſon of the ſeat of their mountainous Countrey, could not but have endangered, or (at leaſt) greatly enfeebled the ſtrength of Iſrael, and rendred them leſs able, if not altogether powerleſs, to have conquered the reſt.

SECT. VI.

Of their compaſſing Idumæa, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himſelf towards the Eaſt, and marched towards the Deſarts of Moab. Which, when Arad the King of the Canaanites underſtood, and that Moſes had blanched the way of Idumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Iſrael aimed at, he thought it ſafeſt, rather to find his Enemies in his Neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his own; which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moſes been enforced firſt to have made his way by the Sword through Idumæa, and thereby though victorious, greatly have leſſened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwiſe than Arad hoped for, yet, being reſolved to make trial, what courage the Iſraelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home; leading the ſtrength of his Nation to the edg of the Deſart, he ſet upon ſome part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great ſpace, and for the many heards of Cattel that they drave with them, could not encamp ſo near together, but that ſome quarter or other was evermore ſubject to ſurpriſe. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he ſlew ſome few of the Iſraelites, and carried with him many Priſoners.

Now, it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predeceſſor, which joyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to thoſe mutinous Iſraelites, which, without direction from God by Moſes, would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it ſeemeth, that the greateſt number of that Army were of the Canaanites, becauſe in the firſt of Deuteronomy 44 the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are ſaid to have beaten the Iſraelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the ſame that had a victory over Iſrael near Cadesbarne; or, if it were his Predeceſſor that then prevailed; this Man finding that Moſes was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was firſt to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moſes purpoſe to paſs Moab, determined, while he was yet in the Deſart, to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the third Verſe of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers that the Iſraelites utterly deſtroyed the Canaanites, and their Cities, they are much miſtaken that think, that this deſtruction was preſently performed by the Iſraelites. But it is to be underſtood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joſua. For, had Moſes at this time entred Canaan in the purſuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Deſarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetch'd a wearisome and needleſs compaſs, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Numb. 14. 45.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it ſelf, but that his Territory lay without it, and near to the Mountain Hor. For, Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt; which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom. Numb. 33. 40.

Again, Horma (for ſo far the Iſraelites, after their victory purſued the Canaanites) is ſeated in the South of Judæa. There is alſo a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no ſuch place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed preſently after the repetition of this Victory, it were enough to prove, that the ſame was obtained in the future, and in Joſua his time, and not at the inſtant of Arads aſſault. For, had the Iſraelites at this time ſack'd the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is alſo Water and Bread. But it was in the time of Joſua, that the Iſraelites took their revenge, and after they had paſſed Jordan; Joſua then governing them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verſe nameth this Arad by the name of his City ſo called, and with him the King of Horma; to which place the Iſraelites purſued the Canaanites. And he named them amongſt thoſe Kings, which he vanquiſhed, and put to death.

Now, after this aſſault and ſurprize by Arad, Moſes finding that all entrance on that ſide was defended, he led the People Eaſtward to compaſs Idumæa, and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites. But the Iſraelites, to whom the very name of a Deſart was terrible, began again to rebel againſt their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whoſe Venom inflamed them, and burnt them as Fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beholding an artificial Serpent, by his Commandment ſet up.

From the Mount Hor, Moſes leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea and Cœloſyria, encamped at Zalmona; and thence he removed to Punon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making theſe journies by the edg of Idumæa, but without it.

it. For Phunon was ſometime a principal City of the Edomites. Now, where it is written in Numb. 21.4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the People, it was not thereby meant, that the Iſraelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonſeca) per viam quæ habet à latere mare rubrum, by the way that ſided the Red Sea; but indeed they croſs'd, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Eſiongaber, Eloth, and Midian; which way, as it lay North and South, ſo Iſrael to ſhun the border of Edom, and to take the utmoſt Eaſt part of Moab, croſſ'd the common way towards the Eaſt, and then they turned again towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth, where he entred the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Suph, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Manſion, that is, where the Mountains ſo called take beginning, and are as yet but ſmall Mountures of Hills, on the Eaſt border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riſeth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having paſs'd that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Jeremy the Prophet, Chap. 48. Verſ. 22. calleth the Houſe of Diblathaim, the ſame which afterward was deſtroyed among the reſt by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River Arnon, and encamped in the Mountains of Abarim; though in the 22 of Numbers, Moſes doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but ſpeaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other ſide of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites; ſpeaking as he found the ſtate of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not antiently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon King of the Amorites; even from the Predeceſſor of Balac Peor then raigning. From Diblathaim, Moſes ſent meſſengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to deſire a paſſage through his Countrey; which, though he knew would be denyed him, yet he deſired to give a reaſon to the neighbour Nations of the War he undertook. And though Edom had refuſed him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moſes alſo in ſending meſſengers to Sehon, obſerved the ſame precept which he left to his Poſterity and Succeſſors, for a Law of the War; namely, in Deut. 20. 10. in theſe words; When thou comeſt neer unto a City to fight againſt it, thou ſhalt offer it peace; which if it do accept of, and open unto thee, then let all the People found therein be tributaries unto thee, and ſerve thee; but if it refuſe, &c. thou ſhalt ſmite all the Males thereof with the edg of the Sword. Which Ordinance all Commanders of Armies have obſerved to this day, or ought to have done.

SECT. VII.

Of the Book of the Battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are loſt.

NOw, concerning the War between Iſrael and Sehon, Moſes ſeemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book, entituled, Liber Bellorum Domini; The Book of Gods Battels: and therefore paſſeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words, after the Geneva Tranſlation, are theſe: Wherefore it ſhall be ſpoken in the Book of the Battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in ſenſe from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect; For thus it is ſaid in the Book: The War of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the Brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which in the Genevian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Suph, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the Eaſt, as he conjectureth. The Text, he readeth thus. Idcircò dici ſolet in recenſione bellorum Jehovæ, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph; & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it ſpoken in repeating of the Battels of Jehovah, againſt Vaheb in the Countrey of Suph, and againſt the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he underſtands, that amongſt the Warrs which the Lord diſpoſed for the good of the Iſraelites, there was in thoſe times a famous memory in the mouth of moſt Men, concerning the War of Sehon againſt Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey near Arnon, out of the poſſeſſion of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate Predeceſſor of Balac, who lived with Moſes; though it be written that this Balac was the Son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For, it ſeems (as it is plain in the ſucceſſion of the Edomites) that theſe Kingdoms were elective, and not ſucceſſive. And as Junius in this Tranſlation underſtandeth no ſpecial Book of the Battels of the Lord: ſo others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any ſpecial Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of Wars in future ages, to be waged in theſe places, and to be written in the Book of Judges. Syracides cap. 46. tells us plainly, that thoſe Battels of the Lord were fought by Joſua; Who was there (ſaith he) before him like to him? for he fought the Battels of the Lord. But ſeeing the Hiſtories of the Scripture elſewhere often paſs over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Books witten of the ſame matter at large; therefore it ſeemeth probable, that ſuch a Book as this there was; wherein the ſeveral victories by Iſrael obtained, and alſo victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Iſraelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the ſame ſhould now be wanting, it is not ſtrange, ſeeing ſo many other Volumes, filled with divine diſcourſe, have periſhed in the long race of time, or have been deſtroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magiſtrates. For the Books of Henoch, howſoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now ſuſpected, are remembred in an Epiſtle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen, ἐν ἀρχῶν, and by Tertullian.

That work alſo of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others beſtow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembred by Joshua, Chap. 10. Vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, Chap. 1. Vers. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Justorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middest of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies; out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Judah to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination, in which the Just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth Psalm, Vers. 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Jerom thinks that David by this Book, understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it was the Book of Exodus. Others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Joshua, by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Manasseh, remembred in the second of Chron. Chap. 33. v. 18, and 19th. Of this Book, also lost, Jerom conceives, that the Prophet Esay was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the Son of Solomon. As to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jeedo the Seer, remembred in the second of Chron. Chap. 9. Vers. 29. With these have the Books of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chro. Chap. 12. Vers. 15. perished; and that of Jehu the Son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron. Chap. 20. Vers. 34. Also that Book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hasirim, of 5000 Verses, of which, that part called Canticum Canticorum, onely remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this, divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembred by Origen, Josephus, Jerom, Cedrenus, Ciccus Asculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these, and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Jerusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

SECT. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

WHen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his antient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battel, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was antiently possest by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anak.

Deut. 2. 9, 10, 11, 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desart of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: so these Nations, which antiently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Joshua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief City was Aroer or Ar, near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same antient Canaanites: and their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; Strong men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Jos. 15. v. 13, 14, 15.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Vaheb the Moabite; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as Strangers and Usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Countrey of his new Conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people and cattel. Towards him therefore hasting himself, they encountred each other at Jahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited, and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were, and descended of Emoreus, or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judæa, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Basan, or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og, a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the only man of mark remaining of the antient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60 Cities walled and defenced: lying between the Mountain of Hermon (which Mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Basan (who attended Moses coming at Edræi) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this, Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that War unto unto Jair the Son of Manesseh: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, sixty walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which Conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasseh possest the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part, that belonged to Sehon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoyning, was given to Reuben, and unto Gad.

SECT. IX.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

1 AFter these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the Valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) sought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their Daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoyning. The Israelites as they had ever been enclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the Plague of Pestilence,
Nu. 25. 1. whereof there perished 24000 persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the Son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cozbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the Plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindness of his all-powerfulness, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews become an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this Valley it was that Moses caused the People to be numbred the third time: and there remained
Nu. 16. 31. of able Men fit to bear Arms 601730, of which, as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000 to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites, practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that, sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000 Moses gave the charge to Phineas the Son of Eleazar
Nu. 31. 8. the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the
Jos. 13. 21. Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Josuah. These five Princes of the Midianites slain by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Cap. 13. 21. Sehon, saith Josuah. He slew also the Men, Male-Children, and Women: saving such as had not yet used the company of Men, but those they saved, and dispers'd them among the Children of Israel to serve them.

And Moses having now lived 120 years, making
Deut. 31. 1. both his own weakness of Body known to the People, and his unability to travel: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to ascend the Mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: He hastned to settle the Government in Josua, Deut. 31. 2. whom he perswaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the Conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter days after the conquest of Og, and Sehon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Aug. l. 4. de Mirab. Sac. Script. Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to St. Augustine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the People, which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in Knowledg, Love, Fear, Deut. 33. and Service of the all-powerful God: He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with several and most comfortable blessings: praising the Deut. 32. 1. greatness and goodness of him, unto whom in his Prayers he commended them: He also commanded Deut. 34. 6. the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the side of the Ark of God. The last that he indited, was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens, and I will speak, and let the Earth hear the words of my Mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this life, unto that Rest which never afterward hath disquiet, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no Man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the Year of the World, 2554.

SECT. X.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOw let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting God's miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this People) he wrought in all things else by the medium of Mens affections, and natural Appetites. And so we shall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplyed by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the Male Children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal Men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own Daughter, to preserve that Child, which afterward became the most Wise, and of all Men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane Knowledg, to be the Conductor and Deliverer of his oppressed Brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he sought by the strength of his Men of War, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatning him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Madian; the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that Solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Law's sheep, far from the preass of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the Lot of a poor Herdsman, God found him out in that Desart, wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the ways and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his People toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his Will and Divine Pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by God's direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto Men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

Jethro's

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Josua; with the sum of the History of Josua.

SECT. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers ways, as it were, prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner, if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward, we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were, prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by antient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were, prepared to be Enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the Mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North; by the same Mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterranian Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the Sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part, were the Canaanites, the antient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by process of time divided into several Families and Name: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as Men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabite the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hittites, and others, who took name after the the Sons of Canaan, and after whom the Countrey in general was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and strangers in that Countrey, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them, no more than the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himself, being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them; especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham. Ex. 17.16.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred who had linked themselves and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so far possest themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. Deut. 2. 5. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael the eldest Son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are joined, as of the same Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion think to have been a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong; whereas Deut. 2. 5. con-

* It seems also that Hus, the Son of Nachor, and Buz his Brother planted themselves in the East side of Jordan, about Esau: where they find the Land of Hus, in which Job dwelt as one of the issue of Hus, the Son of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend, who is called a Buzite. See hereafter chap. 10. sect. 7.

Ex. 17.16. contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless War decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ishmael's eldest son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathei. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ishmael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For Gen. 17. of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to joyn themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolvedly as the Canaanites did. For the Idumæans onely denied the Hebrews a passage, which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Countrey lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the Nu. 21.24. mountains which divided it from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was, that the Moabites might hope, after such a time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moses alloted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites, by special occasion, were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be, as it were, presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withall, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ishmaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being natural men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esau, Princes of Idumæa, might keep in Gen. 25. record, that their Parent was bought out of his birth-Gen. 27. right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he Gen. 33.14 was deceived of his Father's blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumæa.

So also in the posterity of Ishmael, it might remain as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sarah, cast out into the Desart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ishmael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the antient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two wives of that Nation: Gen. 36. one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon the Hittite: and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ishmaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Keniter and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

SECT. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the antient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham (for Melchisedeck may be thought to be of a better Pedegree) we find four named by Moses: and one and thirty remembred by Joshua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of Promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principal Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choisest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Gen. 34. Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Hevites, whom Simeon and Levi slew, together with his Son Sichem, in revenge of their Sisters ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumæa. Num. 21.1

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petræa, or Nabathea, and thrust them over Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he took Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Nu. 21.24. Jos. 9. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 4. c. 5.

Presently

Presently after which victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley
Nu.21.35. between the Mountains Traconi, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Jebusites, and of Jerusalem, with whom Joshua nameth four other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.
Piram, King of Jarmuth.
Japia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites, overthrown in battel, and hanged by Joshua. After Joshua 10. Joseph ant. l. 5. cap. 1. this overthrow Joshua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Jobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest; for it is said in the Josh. 11.1. Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdoms.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy Kings, inforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after
Jud. 1. Joseph. l. 5. c. 2. Juda and Simeon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Jerusalem where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joshua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppresst twenty years after the death of
Jud. 4. Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Debora) overthrew; and his Captain
Jud. 4. Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent:
Psal. 83. Jabin himself perishing afterward in that War.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but Joseph. l. 5. c. 6. commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea, to the South-East of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian Abraham's son, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus
Exod. 3. or Jethres, saith Josephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Jokshan, the great grand-
Cedren. p. 34. child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter, or Neece, Moses married, and of whom, I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him
Jud. 1. descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembred.

1 Sam. 15.6. At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the Desarts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem.
2. Arad of the South parts.
3. Sehon of Essebon.
4. Og of Bashan.
5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, King of Jerusalem. Josh. 10.
6. Hoham of Hebron.
7. Piram of Jarmuth.
8. Japia of Lachis.
9. Debir of Eglon.
10. Jabin of Hazor. Josh. 11.
11. Jobab of Modon.
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* Evi or Evis.

Rekam or Recem, who built Petra the Metropolis of Petræa, so called by the Greeks: and by Esay, cap. 16. v. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14.7. where it is also called Joktheel.
Zur,
Hur, and Reba, † Oreb, Zeb, Zebah, Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6, 7, and 8th of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000 of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumæans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

* These five were first all at one time Kings of several portions of the Madianites, slain by Phineas, and the 12000. which he led against them: Num. 31.8

† These four last were likewise at one time slain in the pursuit of Gideons victory, Jud. c. 7. v. 25. & c. 8. v. 12.

SECT. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ishmaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ishmaelites, I find few that are named; and though of the Ishmaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abra- Gen. 17.20
ham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Mi- Jud. c. 7.
dianites were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ishmaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ishmael, were content to leave those barren Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that joyned with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Madianites:) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petræa: For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petræa; which was very fruitful, though adjoyning to the Desart in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Judæa on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathæi (B) changed into (P.)

Kedar, the second of Ishmael's sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward possest by Manasseh, so much thereof as lay within the Mountains Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedræans.

Abbeel sat down in the Desart Arabia, near the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibsam

Mibsam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, near the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma: who joyned to the Orchens, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athritæ, who bordered the Napatheans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Plin. l. 6. c. 28. Of Jetur the Ituræans, or Camathens: of whom Iobn was King in Davids time.

Of Naphri, the Nubeian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ishmael's sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonæans: who were afterward Junius. called Asitæ, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs; and the antient Syrians, Adad to theirs; and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aretas, as names of Honour.

Exod. 17. The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they joyned with the Canaanites, and Num. 14. beat the Israelites near Cadesbarne. After the government of Othoniel, they joyned them with the Moabites: after Barac, with the Madianites, and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldæa: from Havilah to Shur.

1 Sam. 30. In David's time they took Siklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own loss.

2 Sam. 8. 12. In Ezekias time, as many of them as joyned to Edumæa, were wasted and displanted by the children of Simeon.

SECT. IV.

Of the instauration of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THere lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judæa. For if Pelasgus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withall to make a kind of Meal, and bread of Acorns, who before lived, for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations have vaunted of those their Antiquities, accompanied not only with civil Learning, but with all other kinds of Knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augustine Aug. l. 18. c. 8. de Civit. Dei. have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiæ doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of Fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientiæ pertinere; To have reference to wise Æschyl. in Prom. vinct. inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiters fire was meant, that the knowledge In c. 8. lib. 18. de Civit. Dei. of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the Art so to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but external form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimum Lud. Vives ex Hes. ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno Cœlo quam longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a clear skie discern afar off the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Of this mans knowledge Æschylus gives this testimony.

Ast agebant omnia Æschyl. in Prom. vinct.
Ut fors ferebat: donec ipse repperi
Signorum obitus, ortusque qui mortalibus
Sunt utiles: & multitudinem Artium
His repperi: componere inde literas;
Matremque Musarum auxi ego Memoriam
Perutilem cunctis, &c.

But Fortune govern'd all their works, till when I first found out how Stars did set and rise:
A profitable Art to mortal men:
And others of like use I did devise:
As letters to compose in learned wise
I first did teach: and first did amplifie
The Mother of the Muses, Memorie.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more antient, and but 94 years after Ogyges. Porphyrius sayes, that he Aug. l. 18. c. 3. de Civit. Dei. lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Isaac.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses days, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more antient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Japetus, Æsculus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adjoyning, took name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Alas, the son of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express divine knowledg. Nec vero Atlas sustinere Cœlum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traderetur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset: Neither should Atlas be said to bear up Heaven, nor Prometheus to be faſtened to Caucaſus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be ſtellified, unleſs their divine knowledge had raiſed upon their names theſe erronious fables.

Orpheus ſometimes expreſs'd Time by Prometheus, ſometime he took him for Saturn; as, Rheæ conjux alme Prometheu. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction, and that he lived about this time, the moſt approved Hiſtorians and Antiquaries, and among them Euſebius and S. Auguſtine have not doubted: For the great judgment which Atlas had in Aſtronomy, ſaith S. Auguſtine, were his daughters called by the names of conſtellations, Pleiades and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons courſe, of which Archas the ſon of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Arcas, Arcadia in Peloponneſus took name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more antient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be underſtood, ſaith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obſervation of the Moons courſe: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that beſtow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Iſacius Tzetzes, a curious ſearcher of Antiquities, gave it Atlas of Lybia: who, beſides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable ſtrength: from whom Thales the Mileſian, as it is ſaid, had the ground of his Philoſophy.

SECT. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moſes yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Theſſaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the ſon of Prometheus, ſaith Herodotus, Apollonius, Heſiodus, and Strabo. Heſiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the reſt Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyſſes, makes Deucalion the ſon of Minos: but he muſt needs have meant ſome other Deucalion; for elſe either Ulyſſes was miſtaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulyſſes, after his return from Troy, feigned himſelf to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was ſon to this later Deucalion, the ſon of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus ſerved in that War) and this Deucalion the ſon of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moſes, was long before. In the firſt Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Theſſaly: by which in effect every ſoul in thoſe parts periſhed, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and ſome few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Theſſaly, thoſe people exceeded in all kind of wickedneſs and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, ſo did all that Nation for their foul ſins periſh by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general deſtruction by the flood univerſal. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God ſpared, were both of them eſteemed to be lovers of Vertue, of Juſtice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

Com. Alex. Strom. l. 1. Strabo l. 9.

Non illo melior quiſquam, nec amantior æqui
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla dearum.

No man was better, nor more juſt than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than ſhee.

It is alſo affirmed, that Prometheus fore-told his ſon Deucalion of this over-flowing, and adviſed him to provide for his ſafety: who hereupon prepared himſelf a kind of Veſſel, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And becauſe to theſe circumſtances, they afterward add the ſending out of the Dove, to diſcover the waters fall and decreaſe, I ſhould verily think that Story had been but an imitation of Noah's flood deviſed by the Greeks, did not the time ſo much differ, and S. Auguſtine with others of the Fathers and reverend Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had theſe two of note; Hellen, of whom Greece had firſt the name of Hellas; and Melantho, on whom Neptune is ſaid to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Dolphos, ſo renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 10. ex Euſebio & Hieronimo.

And that which was no leſs ſtrange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time alſo happened under Phaëton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Iſtria, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountains of Veſuvius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many ſtrange fables.

SECT. VI.

Of Hermes Triſmegiſtus.

BUt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the moſt famous and renowned: the ſame which was alſo called Triſmegiſtus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to diſtinguiſh, and ſet them in their own times, both S. Auguſtine and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was eſteemed the god of Theeves, the god of Wreſtlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the ſame with that Mercury, of whoſe many works ſome fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worſhipped; one, the ſon of Nilus, whoſe name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which ſlew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is ſaid to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them Laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought Learning and Letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato alſo confirmeth, ſaying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which ſlew Argus, but by that antient Mercury, otherwiſe Thevet; whom Philo Byblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians, Thoyth; the Alexandrians, Thot; and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who lived about the War of Troy, gives the invention of Letters. But S. Auguſtine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the ſon of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have ſlain Argus. For he finds this Mercury the ſlayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which lived while Moſes was yet young. And yet L. Vives upon S. Auguſtine ſeems to underſtand them to be the ſame with thoſe, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the reſt have remembred. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought Letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifeſt, (if there be any truth in prophane Antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was tranſported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt.

Lud. Vives out of Cicero in Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 8. c. 26.

Euſeb. l. 1. c. 6. de Prap. Evan.

For

For they all confeſs, that Cadmus brought letters firſt into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Moſes and Cadmus, there were theſe deſcents caſt; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moſes lived, and in whoſe time about his tenth year Moſes died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven years; after him Danaus fifty years; after him Linceus: in whoſe time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Moſes his time, flying out of Greece for the ſlaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of thoſe two Mercuries of Egypt, whom St. Auguſtine remembreth, the one the Grand-father, the other the Nephew or Grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moſes found out letters, and taught the uſe of them to the Jews: of whom the Phœnicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this invention was alſo aſcribed to Moſes, for the reaſon before remembred; that is, becauſe the Jews and the Phœnicians had them firſt from him. For every Nation gave unto thoſe men the honour of firſt Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whoſe works he commenteth, to have been four deſcents after Moſes; which he hath out of Virgil, who cals Atlas, that lived with Moſes, the maternal Grand-father of the firſt famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counſeller and Inſtructer of that renowned Iſis, wife of Oſiris. But Ficinus giveth no reaſon for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury inſtructed Iſis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that ſuch an Inſcription was found on a pillar erected on the Tomb of Iſis. Lod. Vives upon the ſix and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of Saint Auguſtine, de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whoſe works are extant, was not the firſt which was entituled Ter Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-child, * Sanchoniaton, an antient Phœnician, who lived ſhortly after Moſes, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus, and by the Egyptians, Thoot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is ſaid to have lived, to wit, three hundred years, gave occaſion to ſome Writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by thoſe who have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philoſophy and Divinity, he is found more antient than Moſes; becauſe the Inventor of the Egyptian Wiſdom, wherein it is ſaid, that Moſes was excellently learned.

Vir. l. 4. Æneid.

Ficin. in Præf. Pæmand. Mercurii Triſmegiſti.

* Or Sanchoniatho: See Euſeb. de prap. Evang. l. 1. c. 6. Vives in lib. 8. c. 26. Aug. de Civ. Dei.

It is true, that although this Mercury or Hermes doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, eſpecially in the approving of Images, which Moſes of all things moſt deteſted: yet whoſoever ſhall read him with an even judgment, will rather reſolve, that theſe works which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptian Prieſts corrupted, and thoſe fooleries inſerted, then that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and ſpirit deviſed. For there is no man of underſtanding, and maſter of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the ſame Tract, thoſe things which are directly contrary in Doctrine, and in Nature: For out of doubt (Moſes excepted) there was never any man of thoſe elder times that hath attributed more, and in a ſtile more reverend and divine unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if thoſe his two Treatiſes now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themſelves: I think it had not been perillous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moſes himſelf; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deviſed by the firſt, and more antient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joſeph, the ſon of Jacob: whom, after the expoſition of Pharaoh's dreams, they called Saphanetphane, which is as much to ſay, as Abſconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But theſe are over-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whoſoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this ſort: Hic ſcripſit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Majeſtatem ſummi ac ſingularis Dei aſſerit, iiſdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; He hath written many Books belonging to, or expreſſing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majeſty of the moſt High, and one God, calling him by the ſame names of God and Father, which we do. The ſame Father alſo feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And ſo contrary are theſe his acknowledgments to thoſe Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians: as for my ſelf I am perſwaded, that whatſoever is found in him contrary thereunto was by corruption inſerted. For thus much himſelf confeſſeth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & ſpiritus; & omnia in ipſo, & ſub ipſo ſunt. Verbum enim ex ejus eſſe prodiens, perfectiſſimum exiſtens, & generator, & opifex, &c. God (ſaith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the Fountain and Life, and Power, and Light, and Mind, and Spirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himſelf proceeding, moſt perfect, generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful Nature, made it alſo fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (ſaith Suydas) called Ter Maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus eſt, in Trinitate unum eſſe Deum aſſerens; Becauſe he ſpake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (ſaith Ficinus) prævidit priſcæ Religionis, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Chriſti, hic futurum judicium, reſurrectionem ſæculi, beatorum gloriam, ſupplicia peccatorum; This Mercury foreſaw the ruine of the old or ſuperſtitious Religion, and the birth of the new Faith, and of the coming of Chriſt, the future Judgement, the Reſurrection, the glory of the Bleſſed, and the torment or affliction of the Wicked or Damned.

L. 1. c. 6.

In Præf. Mer. Triſ.

Maſius.

To this I will onely add his two laſt ſpeeches reported by Calcidius the Platoniſt, and by Volteran out of Suydas. Hactenus, fili, pulſus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto. Cumque poſt paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis abſolutus diſceſſero, videtote ne me quaſi mortuum lugeatis: nam ad illam optimam beatamque Civitatem regredior, ad quam univerſi Civis mortis conditione venturi ſunt. Ibi namque ſolus Deus eſt ſummus Princeps, qui Cives ſuos replet ſuavitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam exiſtimant, mors eſt potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O ſon, being driven from my Country, I have lived a ſtranger and baniſhed man: but now I am repaired homeward again in ſafety. And when I ſhall after a few days (or in a ſhort time) by being looſed from theſe bonds of fleſh and blood, depart from you, ſee that you do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that beſt and bleſſed City, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) ſhall repair. Therein is the onely God, the moſt high and chief Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with ſweetneſs more than marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life.

The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words, with Suydas: O Cœlum, magni Dei sapiens opus, teque O vox Patris quam ille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus Verbum, & Spiritum, cuncta comprehendentem, Miserémini mei: I adjure thee O Heaven, thou wise work of the great God, and thee O voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, have mercy upon me.

But Suydas hath his invocation in these words: Obtestor te Cœlum, magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris, quam loquutus est primùm cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitam Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto; I beseech thee O Heaven, wise work of the great God, I beseech thee O Voice of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the World, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

SECT. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

THere were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the God of the Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his Commentary upon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious Art excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with Devils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldom came out of his mouth: however by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ, or Venefici, and Incantatores; Sophists, Poysoners, and Inchanters: by Hieronie, Sapientes, & malefici; Wise men, and evil doers: and so by Vatablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magick: calling them φαρμακοὺς, workers by Drugs. The Genevan, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Junius, Sapientes, Præstigiatores, & Magi. Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one sence: and Prestigiatores are such as dazel mens eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and working of Moses, and of Pharaoh's Sorcerers appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same Art and gift of knowledge. For the Devil changeth himself into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the ways and workings of the most High. And yet, on the contrary, every work which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or ministery of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, are such, as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above Nature or Art: which two speculations of works of Nature, and of Miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beresith, & opus de mercana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisdom of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis; The Wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in breeding the pied Lambs in Mesopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his Miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of Nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them; assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Joshua, divers other famous men lived in the World, who, after their deaths, for their eminent Vertues, and Inventions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musical plays to Apollo Delphicus; thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenness and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple, and set it on fire: so did Erichthonius institute the like Games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyl, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

In this Age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos: which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the fame to whom the twelve Labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus: (or, as others say, onely nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Egyptium ad Gades perveniſſe, & ibi finem ſtatuiſſe terræ (saith Philostratus;) It is manifest, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the straits of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the Earth. In this time also while Moses wandred in the Desarts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the Days and Age of Moses, there was never any Man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things; whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; never any Man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane Knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by Letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the Creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies; made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men.

Syrac. 45. 12.

He is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick: by Megastenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembred by Moses, Estiæus, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Elanicus, nicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The universal flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others, have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Estieus, and Sybilla have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecatæus wrote a book of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrology of the Caldeans was invented. Is justitia pietateque sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut divino præcepto in Phœniciam venerit, ibique habitaverit; For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book and fifth Chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words: Moses Strabo l. 16 enim affirmavit, docebatque Ægyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: Itemque Afros & Græcos, qui diis hominum figuram affinxerunt: id vero solum esse Deum, quod nos, & terram, & mare continet, quod Cœlum, & Mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profecto imaginem nemo sanæ mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiss, which attributed unto God the images of beasts and cattel: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the shapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeed, which containeth both us, the earth and sea, which we call Heaven, the World, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtless, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things, which are amongst us. That therefore (all devising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which Acts 7. 23. the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words; the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judæus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguish'd into Geometry, Astronomy, Arithmetick, and Musick, the antient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometry, which is by interpretation, Measuring of Grounds, was useful unto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflown and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomy; the site of the Country being a level and spacious Plain, free and clear from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Natural part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetical Philosophy; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies, and living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain fovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that Rains proceed and be from mutations in the Air; that the Planets have their proper souls, &c.

The Divine part of this Wisdom, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the World had a beginning, and shall perish; that Men had their first original in Egypt; partly by means of the temperateness of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in those places: That the soul is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the gods are not known; that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues and benefits bestowed on mankind, have been deified; that those Beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because under those Ensigns they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, mystical, and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole sum of this later Egyptian Learning into three several sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetical in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawk; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty. The other symbolical, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Ænygmatical: Imitative, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified; as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon it self: Tropical or transferent, which applys the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections and actions of their Gods, and of Men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawk signifieth God; the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sun; the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moon: by the form of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulness: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood. Ænygmatical, is a composition, or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sence, the monstrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all divine things are Ænygmatical and obscure. So the Image of the Sun set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth as well in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth, that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Air, aswell from the Waters, as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, signifieth God, hearing, seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending Letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdom, unless he would acknowledge subjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouse, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagus, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the Mouse, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their air: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their Lands were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Soveraign Lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the air, or creep into holes as a Mouse, or run into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his arms, but either be slain, or (being made Captives) till his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus. Herod. l. 4.

The fourth and last part, which is Moral and Politick, doth contain especially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus devised: who in his Books or Dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearful day of Judgment: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also antient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Books of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very antient Historians for their Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menætus, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not only the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other Learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians, before remembred: and that he wrote of that subject 36525 Books or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aireal Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestial a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language coverted by certain learned Philosophers into natural Greek, they seemed to have been first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Physick, six Books; of the Orders of Priests, ten; and of Astrology, four. Clem. Strom. l. 6.

SECT. VIII.

A Brief of the History of Joshua; and of the space between him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Joshua, and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the Egress on, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Joshua the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, took on him the Government of Israel: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to pass the River of Jordan, and to possess and divide among the Israelites, the Land promised.

The beginning of Joshua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the reign of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia; when Danaus governed the Argives; and Erichthonius, Athens. Lib. 18. de Civit. Dei. c. 11.

Joshua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certain discoverers to view the seat and strength of Jericho, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to pass over. Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tavern or Victualling-house, made Joshua know, that the inhabitants of Jericho, and those of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egression, Joshua removed from Sittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the banks of the River Jordan; and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River, giving them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the World, when the River Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might pass over into the Land of Canaan with dry feet. Jos. 2. 1. Jos. 2. 11. Jos. 3. 1. Jos. 3. 3. Jos. 3. 13.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasseh, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and, as we call it in this age, to lead the Vaunt-guard, which through all the Desarts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Judah had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their Habitations, and Country, and Cities of the Amorites, by the help of the rest conquered for them: it agreed with Justice and Equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manesseh should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession. Jos. 1. 12.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they pass'd over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East-side of the City of Jericho, where they incamped the first night. At which place Joshua gave commandment, that all born in the last forty years in the Desarts should be circumcised, which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their Superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needful by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such times as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations. Jos. 4. 19. Jos. 5. 2. Aug. q. 3. in Jos. Thom. part. 3. quæst. 70. art. 4. ad 3

On the fourteenth day of the same moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrey, and having, as it were, surfeited on Manna, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet full ripe, and eat thereof. Jos. 5. 10.

And

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by Lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three several times; first by Moses Jos. 14. 3. to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasseh, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Josua, to the Tribe of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth year of his Government; proved in the 14. of Josua v. 10. and a third division was made to Jos. 18. the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Josua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Josua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own Books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the War, those little Kings, or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those Estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all Wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their own defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those thirty one Kings (all which at length perished in that War) joyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Josua. Only five (the rest looking on to the success) namely the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Jerusalem; the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Army being by Josua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, and hopeless of Mercy by submission, creeping into a Cave under Ground, were thence by Josua drawn forth and hanged. In the pro- Jos. 10. secution of which victory he also took Mekkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Jos. 10. Josua possest himself of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countreys were possest, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsels of necessity, united themselves, to make one gross strength and body of an Army: which Jabin, King of Hazar, practised and gathered together, by Josua discovered, as the same rested neer the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Josua shewed himself a skilful Man of War, for that in those antient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise. Jos. 10. 3. For he marched all night from his Camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he overthrew Jabin and his confederate. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great City of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this War, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the River Jordan at the Springs, so as the Army of Israel past it with a dry Foot; the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Horns; the showers of Hail-stones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the Sword of Israel: again, the arrest of the Sun in the Firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the all-powerful God. Jos. 3. 13. c. 10. v. 11.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Josua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousness, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a People of the Hevites, expresly and by Jos. 9 7. name, by the Commandment of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were lyars, and deceivers, and counterfeits; and that they did over-reach, and as it were, deride Josua, and the Princes of Israel, by feigning to be sent as Embassadours from a far Countrey, in which travel their clothes were worn, their Bread mouldie, which they avowed to have been warm for newness when they first set out; their Barrels and Bottles of Wine broken; their Shoos patch'd; and their Sacks rent and ragged: Yet Josua having Jos. 9. from sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he the 5th to durst not, though urged by the multitude of the 13th. the People, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their lives, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever Man had warrant to break Faith, and to retract his promise made, Josua had it. For first, the Commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might justly have put these Men to the Sword, and have sack'd their Cities, if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the He- Jos. 9. 7. vites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange People that he gave Faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had Jos. 9. 14. done in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his People. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had said, and counselled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these Men who were known Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, Men of an apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if ever Man might have served himself by any evasion or distinction, Josua might justly have done it. For he needed not in this case the help of Equivocation or Mental Reservation. For what he sware, he sware in good Faith; but he sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithless subtilty of Man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the Name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying Man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they to whom he had sworn were worshippers of the Devil.

For

For it is not, as faithleſs men take it, that he which ſweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and ſweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his preſence, That this promiſe (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promiſe in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein profeſs that we fear him not, and that we ſet him at naught, and defie him. If he that without reſervation of Honour, giveth a lie in the preſence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himſelf, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the preſence of God, promiſeth in his Name, and makes him a witneſs of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promiſe, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break thoſe Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick Faith. For though it were 400 years after Joſhua, that Saul, even out of devotion, ſlaughtered ſome of thoſe people deſcended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgat not what the Predeceſſors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Iſraelites had ſworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a conſuming famine; and could not be appeaſed, till ſeven of Sauls ſons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous diſtinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to ſwear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reſerve in ſilence a contrary intent: the life of Man, the eſtates of Men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Maſters, of Vaſſals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not onely be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn aſunder. It is by Oath (when Kings and Armies cannot paſs) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by Oath that Wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an Oath thus powerful, but this; That he that ſweareth by the Name of God, doth aſſure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witneſs, and in whoſe preſence he that taketh the Oath hath promiſed? I am not ignorant of their poor evaſions, which play with the ſeverity of Gods Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the beſt anſwer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whoſoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Chriſtians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greateſt, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely loſe it again, but were ſoon after beaten out of the Holy Land it ſelf: by reaſon (ſaith William of Tyre, a reverend Biſhop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Sanar, who being ſuddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syracon to their aid: whoſe Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Chriſtians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Croſs (the very Croſs, ſay they, that Chriſt died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their laſt refuge, ſeeing they had foreſworn themſelves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghoſt, That he that ſpeaketh lies, ſhall be deſtroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, ſlayeth the ſoul: how much more perillous is it (if any peril be greater than to deſtroy the ſoul) to ſwear a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perſwaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the ſaid King had compelled him to peace, the moſt advantagious that ever was made for the Chriſtians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the War. And though the ſaid King was far ſtronger in the field than ever; yet he loſt the battel with 30000 Chriſtians, and his own life. But I will ſtay my hand: For this firſt volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgements upon Faith-breakers; be it againſt Infidels, Turks, or Chriſtians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of Oaths now-a-days, is rather made a matter of cuſtom, than of conſcience.

Pſal. 5.6. Wiſd. 1.11

It is alſo very remarkable, That it pleaſed God to leave ſo many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Iſrael, to ſcourge and afflict them, by fore-ſeeing their Idolatry, and, as it is ſaid in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make War. For theſe Cities hereafter named did not onely remain in the Canaanites poſſeſſion all the time of Joſhua; but ſoon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforc'd to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardeſt acceſs. And thoſe of Judah were not able to be maſters of their own Vallies; becauſe, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And thoſe principal Cities which ſtood on the Sea-ſide, adjoyning unto Judah, were ſtill held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philiſtims: as Azzah, Gath, Aſdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Joſh. 23. Judg. 1. & Judg. 3.2. Judg. 1.34 Judg. 1.19 Joſ. 11.19. 1 Sam. 17. 4.

Neither did the children of Manaſſeh over Jordan expel the Geſhurites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the North parts of Baſhan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nepthalims poſſeſs themſelves of Bethſhemiſh, nor of Bethanah; but they inforc'd thoſe Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Aſher expell the Zidonians, nor thoſe of Acho, or Acon, Athlah, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor inforc'd them to tribute.

Joſ. 13.13. Judg. 1.31

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Alſo the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manaſſeh, on the Weſt of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethſhean, Taacnah, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea Jeruſalem it ſelf did the Jebuſites defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Joſ. 16.10. Jud. 1. 27

Now Joſhua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Iſrael, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expreſſed in the Scriptures, which cauſeth divers to conjecture diverſly of the continuance. Joſephus gives him five and twenty years: Seder Ollam Rabbi, the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie, eight and twenty; and Maſſius ſix and thirty: Maimonius cited by Maſſius, fourteen: Joannes Lucidus, ſeventeen: Cajetanus, ten: Euſebius giveth him ſeven and twenty: and ſo doth S. Auguſtine: Melanchon, two and thirty: Codoman, five and twenty. But whereas there paſſed 480 years from the delivery of Iſrael out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is neceſſary that we allow to Joſhua onely eighteen of them; as finding the reſt ſupplyed otherwiſe, which to me ſeems the moſt likely, and as I think, a well-approved opinion.

The ſame neceſſity of retaining preciſely 480 years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of errour, ſuch as have inſerted ſerted years between Joſua and Othoniel, of whom Euſebius finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reaſon in his four and twentieth and laſt Chapters upon Joſua: Bunting reckons it nine Years: Bucolzer and Reuſner but one; Codoman, twenty; and Nicephorus no leſs than three and thirty: whereas following the ſure direction of theſe 480 Years, there can be no void years found between Joſua and Othoniel, unleſs they be taken out of thoſe eighteen aſcribed unto Joſua by the account already ſpecified. The praiſes and acts of Joſua are briefly written in the ſix and fortieth Chap. of Eccleſiaſticus, where among many other things it is ſaid of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the Battels of the Lord.

Euſeb. præp. Evang.

That he wrote the Book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, becauſe it is ſaid in the laſt Chapter, verſe 26. And Joſua wrote theſe words in the Book of the Law of God; which ſeemeth rather to have been meant by the Covenant which Joſua made with Iſrael in Sichem, where they all promiſed to ſerve and obey the Lord: which promiſe Joſua cauſed to be written in the Book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulenſis: Theodoret doth likewiſe conceive, that the Book of Joſua was collected out of an antient Volume, intituled Liber Juſtorum, remembred by Joſua himſelf; and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon theſe words of the 26th Verſe, And Joſua wrote theſe words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it: for when the People had anſwered Joſua; The Lord our God will we ſerve, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Joſua made a Covenant with the People, and wrote the ſame in the Book of the Law of God.

1 Sam. 10. 13.

Joſ. 5. 24 26.

There lived at once with Joſua, Ericthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke Beaſts together, thereby to till the ground with more eaſe and ſpeed: And about the ſame time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is ſaid) ſlew the fifty Sons of Egyptus, all but Linceus, who ſucceeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived alſo with Joſua, Phœnix, and Cadmus, and neer the end of Joſua's life, Jupiter is ſaid to have raviſhed Europa the Daughter of Phœnix (afterward married to Auſterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But St. Auguſtine reports this raviſhment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old Man at the War of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong Man at the ſame Trojan War. And ſo doth Neſtor reckon up in the Councel of the Greeks, Theſeus and Peritheus for Men of Antiquity and of Ages paſt: Minos being yet more antient than any of theſe. But hereof elſewhere.

Homer Odyſſ. & Iliad.

Hom. Iliad 1.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Iſrael that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with ſundry Stories depending upon thoſe places.

SECT. I.

The Proœm to the deſcription of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Expoſition of the name of Syria.

THe Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Joſua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which ſo many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, ſhall be remembred when we come to the deſcription of Samaria: but becauſe the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greateſt part of the Story paſt, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better underſtanding of both) to make a Geographical deſcription of thoſe Regions: that all things therein perform'd by the places known, may the better be underſtood, and conceived. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have beſtowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do ſhew what Cities and Places of ſtrength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleaſed God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and ſcourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (ſaith Auguſtine) ideo maximè iraſcitur in hoc ſeculo, ne iraſcatur in futuro: & miſericorditer temporalem adhibet ſeveritatem, ne æternam juſtè inferat ultionem; The Divine goodneſs is eſpecially therefore angry in this World, that it may not be angry in the World to come, and doth mercifully uſe temporal ſeverity, that it may not juſtly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the Cities herein deſcribed, I have added a ſhort Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-weals: and to help my ſelf herein, I have peruſed divers of the beſt Authors upon this ſubject: among whom, becauſe I find ſo great diſagreement in many particulars, I have rather in ſuch caſes adventured to follow mine own reaſon, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And becauſe Canaan, with Paleſtina of the Philiſtims, and the Lands of Og and Sehon Kings of Baſan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but ſmall Provinces of Syria: it ſhall be neceſſary firſt to divide and bound the general, and ſo to deſcend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largeſt deſcription, and as it was antienly taken, imbraced all thoſe Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Ptol. Aſiæ. tab. 4. Ptol. 5.

Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumæa, towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besids Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petræa, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aran Naharajim is expounded: also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syriæ, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

Auvogalas Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Cœlosyria, which the Latins call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitful Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus, and Antilybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of 1 King. 11. the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybanus, the Regal seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: over which Adadezer
Herod in Pelim Dio. l. 27. commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phœnicia, and the People Syraphœnicies: and lastly, Syria Palæstina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomy maketh Judæa Ptol. Asiæ ab. 4. also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syria Judæa.

SECT. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

But that Land which was antiently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great Desarts between Idumæa and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermon, Galaad, and Arnon
Strab. l. 10. towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi, or Traconitæ, and Ptolemie, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Cham:
Caleb. f. 62. Et lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrews, who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sons, who past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens of going, or passing over. And because the Children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before Euseb. prap Evan. l. 7. c. 3. them both. It had also the name of Judæa from Juda; and then afterwards intituled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was Born, and Buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four; namely into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. Galilee is double, the superiour called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Judæa are distinguished, it is plain in the Matth. 2. Luke 2. John 4. Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now besides these Provinces of Phœnicia, and Palæstina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also of the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted apart of Canaan also: as well because antiently possest by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastermost parts are again divided into Basan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are known to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general: and by the names of Traconitis, Piceria Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, for these are his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar until Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Country North and South: then it followeth in the Text And as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lasha: by which words Moses setteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the soal of your Feet shall Deut. 11. 24. tread, shall be yours: your coast shall be from the Wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Country North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon; and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azza, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petræa, and the Desart, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never possest; nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perah was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Jos. 23. 4. Josua: Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan, with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well Vadian. Epitom. trium terræ partium c. Palæstin. noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per in gentes amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the Deut. 11. 21. Heavens were above the Earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the merciful goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, then while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joyned to the prosperity of Israel.

Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye Deut. 11. keeep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your days in the Land which the Lord sware unto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the Heavens were above the Earth. For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these Command-
Deut. 11. ments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all those Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerful Majesty, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot misslike that exposition of Melanchon: For, saith he, Ostendit promissionem præcipuam non esse de hoc politico Regno; He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which St. Hierome made to a certain Heretick in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused St. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viventium terram qua in cœlis est; (that is) Only to that land of the living which is in Heaven. Quoniam tota Judæorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160 milliarium, latitudinem verò 40 & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Judæis occupata, sed tantùm divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160 miles in length, and 40 miles in breadth, and in these are Countries, Places, Cities, and many Towns, which the Jews never possest, but were only granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esay, touching the blessings promised unto Jerusalem, where he hath these words: De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Pa-
Sap. 49. 14. lestinæ regione petendam, qua totius Provinciæ, deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperator, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut cœlestibus utatur pluviis, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extructione soleat: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, festinavarunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learn, that Jerusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged with craggy Mountains, and suffereth the penury of Thirst: so as it preserveth rain Water, and supplyeth the scarsity of Wells by building of Cisterns; but this Jerusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders have hastened: so far St. Hierome; where also, to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself: Neque hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Judææ, ut hæreticus Sycophanta mentitur; aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem, quæ fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis: sed ut detestiam supercilium Judæorum, qui Synagogæ angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ præferunt: Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judæa, as the heretical Sycophant doth belie me: or to take away the truth of the History, which is the Foundation of spiritual understanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther than the breadth of the Church: For if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with Milk and Honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literal sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East-bound, should be taken only in a spriritual sense) yet nevertheless that Hierom's opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates, and that the promise it self was never so large: much less the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nepthalim, and Zabulon held the Northermost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I spake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversly expressed, so that to the unskilfull they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the antient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, because the Antient expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the later do think fit.

SECT. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

§. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the Son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500 and odd persons, all men above twenty years of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Desarts, there remained of their issues, besides Women and Children, 53400 bodies fit for the Wars: which past the River of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, and after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon and the Fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus Ant. Itin. makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oyl, and Wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Propheſy, Asser pinguis panis: Concerning Asser, his Bread Gen. 40. shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

§. II.

Of Zidon.

THe first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asser, was Zidon, which Josua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks and Q. Curtius make Agenor the Justin. l. 18 founder thereof: and Justine derives the name from the abundance of Fish found on those shores: wherefore it hath been called Zidona. But that it was far more antient, Moses, Josua, and Josephus witness, Gen. 10. the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Cana- Joseph. an's Sons; and so strong it was in Josua's time, as neither did himſelf attempt it, neither could the Aſſerites, or any of their ſucceſſours maſter it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Chriſt; a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magiſtrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Eſay, Jeremiah, Ezechiel, and Zacharias, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies Sword, and by the Peſtilence.

Eſa. 23. Jer. 47. Ezek. 28. & 32. Zac. 9.

Zidon is ſeated on the very waſh of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea, &c. It hath to the North the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which ſtandeth between it and Tyre: the diſtance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is fourteen thouſand paces, ſaith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and ſo doth Weiſſingbury in his deſcription of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of diſtance as well between theſe two known Cities, as all the reſt, make it over-difficult to deviſe any new Scale to the Map and Deſcription of the Holy Land.

Paleſt. Seig. f. 19. Vadian. Phæn. f. 273. Strabo. l. 16.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memory: the ſtory which Zeno the Philoſopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time conſumed and loſt. It ſeemeth to be more antient than Tyre; which was alſo built by the Zidonians. For as * Strabo noteth, Homer ſpeaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, becauſe it was but a member of Zidon; and a City ſubject to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacy, and became far more renowned, opulent, and ſtrong: From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel the principal workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flouriſhed in all ſorts of Learning, ſo did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zachary calling them the wiſe Zidionians. The City was both by Nature and Art exceeding ſtrong, having a Caſtle or Citadell on the North-ſide, ſtanding upon an unacceſſible Rock, and compaſſed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Chriſtians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Caſtle it hath on the South-ſide by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It alſo ſent many other Colonies beſide that of Tyre, into places remote: as unto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece. Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of * Glaſs, which they uſed to make of thoſe Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Medeterran Sea, near Ptolomais, or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of thoſe cleer Glaſſes which they make at Murana: of which St. Hierom and Pliny: Zidon inſignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrariis officinis nobilis; Zidon a famous Glaſs-maker, or a skilful worker in Glaſs-houſes.

* Strabo, l. 16. Zach. 9. 2. Herod. l. 5. Plin. l. 5. c. 9.

* It ſeems that even in Joſua's time they practiſed glaſs-making, whence Junius for Miſphreboth majim, which ad verbum is as much as combuſtiones aquarum, reads fornaces vitrarias, Joſ. 11. 8. as it ſeems, becauſe thoſe Fornaces were where there was ſtore of Water, either for the moving of the Bellows by the force of the Water, or for other neceſſary uſes. But there are others that take them for Salt-pits, and others again for hot Baths.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the reſt of the Cananites) worſhippers of Baal and † Aſtaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the iſſue of Canaan (as Pinead gathers out of 1 Sam. 31. 10. and Judg. 10. 6.) yet eſpeciallly and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 Reg. 11. 5. in the Story of Solomon's Idolartry, where Aſtaroth is called the god of the Zidonians; and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the ſtory of Achab, the chief worſhipper of Baal, where it is ſaid, that he marrying Jezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worſhipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Aſtaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Baalim, and Aſtaroth, 1 Sam. 12. 10. and elſewhere: for even the name Aſtaroth, as I am informed by a skilful Hebrician, is plural; the ſingular being Aſtoreth: whence Judg. 2. 13. the Septuagint read ἐλάτρευσαν τοῖς ἀσταρταις· They worſhipped the Aſtarties. The occaſion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Aſtoreths, may be diverſly underſtood: either in reſpect of the diverſity of the forms of the Images, or of the worſhip in divers places, or of the ſtories depending upon them: which (as fables uſe to be) were doubtleſs in divers Cities divers. Auguſtine quæſt. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Aſtarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by ſuch a name as Aſtarte. Tully, lib. 3. de Nat. Dearum, making divers Goddeſſes of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Aſtarte: whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the Wife of Adonis: as alſo Macrob. 2. Saturn cap. 21. ſays, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worſhipped of the Aſſyrians: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Tammuz (whom there the Idolatrous Women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may ſeem that in the worſhip of Aſtarte or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis: as alſo the Grecians did in their Songs of Adonis: Mourn for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Oſiris in the ſacrifice of Iſis: whoſe loſs of her Husband Oſiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus loſs of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iſide & Oſiride, that Oſiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may ſeem to be the ſame with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howſoever theſe Zidonians were thus antiently foſtered with the Milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Goſpel of Chriſt after his Aſcenſion, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moſes and the Prophets ſo many years, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Wo be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agon, &c. but I ſay unto you, it ſhall be eaſier for Tyrus and Zidon at the day of judgment, than for you.

It received a Chriſtian Biſhop with the firſt: who was afterward of the Dioceſs of Tyre. But in the year of our Redemption 636 it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their poſſeſſion till Baldwinus the firſt, then King of Jeruſalem: in the year 1111, by the help of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to viſit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Euſtace Gremer, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the year 1250 it was re-edified and ſtrengthned by Lodowick the French King: while he ſpent four years in the Wars of the Holy Land. Laſtly, in the year 1289 it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in poſſeſſion of the Turk, and hath the name of Zai.

§. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after that Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing neer it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quæque Sareptano palmita missa bibas.

I have no Wine of Gaza, nor Falerna Wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's Vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Diocess of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not far from Sarepta was scituate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose Fleet of Ships commanded, and gave Law over all the Mediterranian Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyrii tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Cales. In Italy, Nola: in Asia the less, Dromos Achillis, which City the Scoliast of Appollonius placeth neer the River Phillis in Bythinia.

It had antiently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Josua 19. taking name from the scituation; because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day; the place being still known by the name of the antient Tyre: and because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the Son of Japhat to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very antient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of antient days? yet that Thiras the Son Japhet set himself in the bosom of the Canaanites, who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to perswade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Josephus and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomon's Temple 240 years: Cedrenus 361; who also addeth, that Tyrus the Wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700 paces from the Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Seas, as some read; or as others, in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it scituate at the entry of the Sea; As also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mart of the people for many Isles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning and in manufacture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crown of Gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defendor of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denyed, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many Ships as he could, and brought from Lybanus so great a number of Ceders, and so many weighty Stones from the old City of Tyre adjoining, as, notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a Foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their Walls, he overtopt them with Turrets of Wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000 more to be hung up in a rank all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authors affirm) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000 Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provincial Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, Brother to Jaddas the high Priest of Jerusalem, obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garizim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in Obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his Son-in-Law Manasse, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrus called Sanabula, died.

Joseph. Ant. Jud. l. 11. c. 8.
De bell. sacr. l. 13. c. 4.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with threescore Ships of War held the Port: to the end that neither any Victuals nor any supply of Men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve sail scattered that Feet, and took 500 Prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lievtenants five years, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greek) adding, that Elulæus, whom Tyrius called Heliseus, was then King of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty years.

Soon

Soon after this repulse of Salmanasser; and about 200 years before the victory of Alexander, Nebuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Jerusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairful work, of joyning it to the Continent. For Nebuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawsey and passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Against Nebuchodonosor, for many years, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after 13 years siege or more, the Tyrians despoyled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of Ships, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their Wives, Children, and portable riches, sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that War: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthned this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nebuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingom and the spoil thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierom noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action to attain unto that eternal happiness reserved for his Servants and Saints: yet such is the boundless goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Ezek.29.18. Isa.23,&c. Ezek.29.19

Now of this enterprise of Nebuchodonosor's against Tyre, prophane Historians have not been silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phœnician Histories, remember it.

Joseph. ant. l. 10. c. 13.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it self again: and continued in great glory about 300 Years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neer 600 years: the Archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Jerusalem only, who within his own Dioces had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphyria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Surepta, Zidon; Cæsarea Philippi, Berytas, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Tortosa) and Maratlea. But in the year 636 it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phœnicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracen: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488 years.

Guil. Tyr. bell sac.

In the year 1112 it was attempted by Baldwine King of Jerusalem; but in vain: yet in the year 1124 by Guaremonde, Patriach of Jerusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their Fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered and subjected to the Kings of Jerusalem, and so it remained 165 years.

Guil. Tyr. 11. Bell. sacr. 17.

Finally, in the year 1185, Saladine having first taken Jerusalem, removed his whole Army, and sate down before Tyre: drawing his Fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then only remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain rafters of Timber, fired, burnt, and brake the Saracens Fleet, and sallyed out resolvedly upon his Army, slew so great numbers of them; and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory, the body of that famous Frederick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a River unfoordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, neer unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origin, garnished and graven with guilt pillars of Marble, 940 years before therein buried: but in the year 1289 the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

II. IV.

Of Ptolomais, or Acon.

THe third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtain, on the South bound of Asser, was Acho, which was the antient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authors affirm, that it took name from Acon the Brother of Ptolomie. Pliny calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colony of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeigler it is called Helipos.

Plin. l. 5. c. 19. In descrip. terr. sanct.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies infidelously wrested from his Son-in-law Alexander, which called himself the Son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolomie, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabeus treacherously surprised and slain, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousness of Typhon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the War against Demetrius, one of the Sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolomy joyned, overthrown and treacherously murthered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his Father-in-law Ptolomie: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three days, for God struck him by death.

Ptolomæus Philomet. ser. 1 Mac. 1. 10. 1 Mac. 11. 18.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his Regal seat: two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Jerusalem some four and thirty miles; four miles to the North from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual Light, like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the Night to those Ships which came neer and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seat of the Dioces of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636 (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the year 1104 it it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa, to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourscore and seven, Saladine King of Ægypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291 it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000, entered, sack'd, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Broch. Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is a Castle of St. George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. Itin. 4. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every Man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those days, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adricomius in his description of Asser, to have been in the fields of Lybanus, between the River Adonis, and Zidon: his own words are these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur non longè à Beryto, memorant inclytum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asservâsse: eamque mactata bestia parenti restituisse. In cujus rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit ædificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the Beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus far Adricomius. His Authors he citeth Lodovicus Roman, Patric. Navigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Asser, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorical, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtween Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea-coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which St. Hierome called Achziph, and Josephus Ecdippos, Pliny Ecdippa, one of those which defended it self against the Asserites. Bellforest finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castles of Alexander to be one, but I know not from whence he had it.

Hieron de Locis Hebr. Joseph. Bell. Jud. l. 1. c. 11. Plin. l. 5. c. 19. The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, travelled as far to the North as Rooh, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Asser, which Rechob, as also Berothe, which by Ezekiel, cap. 47. ver. 16. is placed in these North borders, belonging in Davids time to the King Hadarhezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel, chap. 8. ver. 8. and chap. 10. vers. 6. and it defended it self against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling down, slew seven and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Ahab. Here Junius finds that the Philistims encamped a little before the battel at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel the 9. & 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which Battel the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which Jos. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others convert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek. 1 King. 20. 29. 1 Sam. 29. 1.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander: for Alexander Macedon built it when he besieged Tyre, and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it self into the Sea, between Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a Mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of Water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of living Water: whence not only all the Fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large Pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a Bow-shot of Ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short passage, saith Brochard. Cant. 4. Itin. 1.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond it under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Achsaph, or Axab, or after St. Hierome, Aciſap, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Josua at the Waters of Merom. Jos. 12. 20.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

FUrther in the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Eastermost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107, thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoyning being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third King of Jerusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Asser: whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other: to wit, Castrum, Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium and Belfort: the first neer the Sea under the Hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possest the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomais Acbon. The first fortress was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, neer the City Rama: of which in this Herold. l. 2. c. 4. Continuationis, Bel. &c.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which St. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Asser, as Roab (or Recob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roab they place Gabala (which Herod surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua displicere significat (saith Weisshinburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Cabol (or Cabul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land, though bordering Asher, on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for as it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears, 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobeæ, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the Son of Levi, who from a mean estate gathering together four hundred Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judæa: by whose practise Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying in all he could, the City of Gascala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity during the contention, to the Tyrians, and Gadarins, to surprize it: who at the same time forc't it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josephus's authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Tytus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Major, and * Cades (or Cadessa) of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Near the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Maccabeus overthew the Army of Demetrius.

Matth. 15. Mark 7. Macca. 1. 73 Josephus Antiq. 13. c. 8.

There are, besides these fore-named Cities, within the Tribe of Asser, divers others: as on the South border, and near the Sea, Mesal, or Misheal: within the Land † Besara, ‖ Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the South border between Asher and Zabulon: on the North-side joyning to Syro-phœnicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chethlon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way: under which, towards the Sea, is Cali, and then * Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his Son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Jos. 19. 28. where also we read of Nebiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beron: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Asserites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Judg. 1. 30. to which out of Josua we may add Ebron, Ambad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Asser.

THe Rivers to the North of Asser, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Zeigler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea near Berytas: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Pliny, and the first of Macabees the eleventh Chapter; but neither of those authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Asser: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Isle of Aradus, not far from Balanæa, witness Ptolomy: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus, Velana; which River boundeth Phœnicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principal River of Asser, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Chrot out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streams which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul, of the City adjoyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Jepthael, which I find in no other Author, and for which he citeth Jos. 19. but the word * Ghe, which is added there to Jepthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and for a Valley, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Mantanus turn it. There is also found in Asser the River of Belus, remembred by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith ‖ Pliny: out of the sands of this River are made the best Glass, which sometimes the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cendevia, as all Cosmographers, both antient and modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true that the River of Chison taketh Water from Chedumim, but not in that fashion which Montanus, hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus but farther to the South between Caiphas and Sycaminum, witness Zeigler, Adricomius, and Schrot.

Plin l. 9. Asia. tab. 4. Post Orthosian & Eleutherum est Tripolis.

* The word Nachal is ambiguous, either for a Valley or for a River: but this word Ghe is alway a Valley, as in Gehinnon and Gestmanum.

Joseph. l. 2. Bell. Jud. c. 3.

‖ L. 5. c. 19. In Jos. c. 19. v. 26. it is called Sichor, of which name many understand another stream, Jos. 13. 3. which running by Petra of Arabia, falleth into the Lake Sirbonis, and divideth Egypt from the promised Land, whereabout they place Rhinocolura, for which City Junius taketh Sichor in that place of Josua: but howsoever whether this Sichor, Jos. 13. 3. be a River or a City, it appears that this name is found both in the North bound of the Holy Land, Jos. 19. 26. and in the South bound, Jos. 13. 3.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living Waters adjoyning to Tyre: and † Maserephot, or after St. Hierome, Maserephotmaim, whose Well filled by the Flood of the Sea adjoyning (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the Water make Salt thereof, as at Nantwitch.

The Mountains which bound Asser on the North, are those of Anti-lybanus: which with Libanus bound Cœlosyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phœnicia and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land Eastward, 400 stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley Valley of Cœlosyria: which those Mountains include: but Pliny gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theipsophon, or Dei facies, near Tripolis, to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-Lybanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desart Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phœnicians, Syrion; and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being still a part of Lybanus, as the Prophet Jeremy proveth: Galaad, tu mihi caput Libani: noting, that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the name of Traconitæ: and Ptolomy by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth these Mountains bordering Asser Libanus, for Anti-Libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers; but he giveth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because (according to Tacitus) the highest of them are covered with snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos, (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whiteness. Others call them by that name of the Fankincense, which those Trees yield: because λιβάνοτ☉ is also the Greek word for that Gum.

Niger out of Aphrodiseus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kind of honey dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Asser, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abarim in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

SECT. IV.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

§. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THe next portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the son of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400 persons, able men to bear arms, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Desarts, there entrered the Holy Land of their sons, 45400. besides Infants, Women and Children, under twenty years of age. The Land of Nephtalim took beginning on the North part, from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hill of Libanus adjoyning, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and one the East and South-East by Jordan.

Guil. Tyr. Bell. sacr. l. 9. c. 15. Theod. 4. hist. Eccle.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountains adjoyning shadowed from the Sun the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Strab. Mela. l. 2. c. 9. Justin. Gestel. in itinerar. Joseph. in plur. locis, Euseb. 8. Demonst. Volat. l. 11. f. 243.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean Paraphrast; otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour sent a Colony: the other Gestelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a City in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queen commanded.

Abila also gave name to the Region adjoyning, of which Lysanius the son of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomy gave it the addition of Lysanii, and called it Abila Lysanii. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes, that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Apuleius, not Abileus. After that this City of Abila or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith, Priscillinus became the Bishop thereof: slain afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Trever. For distinction of this City (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembred, that in the Tribe of [a] Manasseh, joyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another City of the same name, saving that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembred in the 20th Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachea, and Jerom, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for distinction sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Town of Mahaca the wife of Macir, the son of Manasseh, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This City Joab besieged, because Seba the son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thereinto for succour: but a certain wise woman of the City perswading the people to cast Seba's head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same City was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

[a] Also a third in Ephraim, called Abel-Mechola; and a 4th in Reuben, called Abel-Sittim, also Abel-Mitsraim, at the Foord of Jordan, and (as it seems) in the same Tribe of Reuben, of all which in that which follows: to which also we may add Abel-Mognum, the name, as some think, of a City, otherwise called Bethshemes, near the border of the Philistims, or according to others, of the great stone in the border. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Joseph. ant. lib. 7. cap. 10. 2 Sam. 20. 1 King. 15. 2 King. 15.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plain ground; and therefore no marvel that many Towns (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places took name; as Bochim, Jud. 2. 4. and so doubtless * Abel-Mitsraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Junius in his notes upon Num. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plain ground there, (to wit, in the Land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Town of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Jephta pursued them.

* And Abel Magnum. 1 Sam. 6. 18 Judg 7. 24 & 1 Reg. 19. 15. Judg. 11. 35.

§. II.

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim was that famous City of Jabin, in Joshua's time called Asor, (or after the Chaldæan Paraphrast, Haszor) by Josephus, Asora; by Junius, * Chatzor: which Laicſtan names Heſron; the Regal City, and Metropolis of Canaan: ſeated in the Weſt part of Nephtalim, towards Aſher. In this City was that great Rendevous and Aſſembly of thoſe four and twenty Kings againſt Joſhua: who being all overthrown, ſlain, and ſcattered, this their powerful City was by Joſhua taken and burnt to duſt. But in proceſs of time the ſame being re-built by the Canaanites, a ſecond King Jabin, 137 years after the death of this firſt Jabin, invaded the Iſraelites: and being ordained of God to puniſh their Idolatry, he prevailed againſt them, and held them in a miſerable ſervitude 20 years; till Debora the Propheteſs overthrew Siſera, Jabins Leivtenant, and his Army, near the Mountain Tabor. This City Solomon reſtored at ſuch time as he alſo re-edified Gezar, burnt by Pharaoh of Egypt, with * Megiddo, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260 years after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalaſar, King of the Aſſyrians. It is now, ſaith Adricomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis. There is another City of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, ſeated on the confines of Aſcalon, called the new Hazor, ſaith ‖ Jerom.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Juda, ſee c.9. ſect.1. Of a 4th in Benjamin, ſee that which follows in this place: of a fifth in this Tribe of Nephtalim, called Hen-Chatſir, we read *Joſ.*19 27. whereto we may add Chatſor-Heman, in the uttermoſt North-eaſt of Manaſſeh, over Jordan, Ezek. 47. *Num.*34 8

Alſo in Simeon Chatſor-Suſima, of which 1 Chron. 4. 31. which alſo is called Chatſir-Sula, and Chatſar-Gadda: and laſtly, Chatſar-Shuleb, another City of Simeon, fol. 19. 3. * 1 King. 9. ‖ Hieron. loc. Hebr. l. 4. out of Neh. 11. 33. as it ſeems.

‖. III.

Of Cæſarea Philippi.

THere was alſo on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned City of Lais, or Lajiſch, as Junius writes it, or Leſchen; which City the children of Dan (being ſtraitned in their Territory under Juda) invaded and maſtered; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Gen. 14. at which place Abraham ſurpriſed Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diviſion of Syria, otherwiſe called Sophena. And after the poſſeſſion of the Danites, it had the joynt name of Leſchem-Dan. Weiſſenburg writes it Lacis; the Geneva, Laiſh; Joſephus, Dana, Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witneſs, Neubrigenſis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monk, and Poſtellus: who alſo taketh this City to be the ſame, which in Matth. 15.39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Mark, ſpeaking of the ſame ſtory, Dalmanutha. At ſuch time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it ſeemeth that it was either a free City, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or elſe ſubject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written Judg. 18. And there was none to help, becauſe Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no buſineſs with other men: for it was above thirty Engliſh miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

Jud. 18.27 *Joſ.*19 47. Judg. 18. *Chap.*8.10. Verſe 28. Plin. l. 5. c. 15.

In after-times when theſe Regions became ſubject to the ſtate of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountain adjoyning ſo called: and therefore Ptolomy calls it Cæſarea Paniæ. Hegeſippus calls it Parnium, ſaith Weiſſenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy; for in Hegeſippus, ſet out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at ſuch time as Philip the ſon of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Traconitis, ſometime Baſan: this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tyberius Cæſar, he called it * Cæſarea Philippi: and ſo it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis, and one of the firſt Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the ſucceeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: ſo in S. Jeroms time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and ſo re-called it, with the Territory adjoyning by the antient name. Of this City was that woman whom Chriſt healed of a bloody iſſue, by touching the hem of his garment with a conſtant Faith: who afterward, as ſhe was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindful of Gods goodneſs, and no leſs grateful for the ſame, as Euſebius and Nicephorus report, cauſed two Statues to be caſt in pure Copper: the one repreſenting Chriſt, as near as it could be moulded: the other made like her ſelf, kneeling at his feet, and holding up her hands towards him. Theſe ſhe mounted upon two great Baſes or Pedeſtals of the ſame metal, which ſhe placed by a Fountain near her own houſe: both which (ſaith Euſebius) remained in their firſt perfection, even to his own time: which himſelf had ſeen, who lived in the reign of Conſtantine the Great. But in the year after Chriſt 363. that Monſter Julian Apoſtata, cauſed that worthy Monument to be caſt down and defaced: ſetting up the like of his own in the ſame place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts ſundered and ſcattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is alſo confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth Book and twentieth Chapter.

* Of another Cæſaria (or Cæſarea) called Cæſarea Paleſtina: ſee hereafter in the former part of Manaſſeh. Of Dioceſaria, ſee Sepphoris in Zabulon. *Euſeb. hiſt. Eccleſ. l.*7. c. 14. Niceph. l. 6. c. 25.

This City built by the Danites, was near the joyning together of thoſe two Rivers, which ariſing from the ſprings of Jor and Dan, the two apparent Fountains of Jordan, in a ſoil exceeding fruitful and pleaſant: for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was that S. Peter acknowledged Chriſt to be the Son of God: whereupon it was anſwerrd, Tu es Petrus, & ſuper hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Chriſtian Faith, it was honoured with a Biſhops ſeat: and it ran the ſame fortune with the reſt, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Chriſtians: under Fulch the fourth King of Jeruſalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damaſcus wreſted it from the Chriſtians; and ſhortly after by them again it was recovered. Laſtly, now it remaineth, with all that part of the World, ſubjected to the Turk.

a Joſephus in the book of the Jewiſh wars, *c.*18. ſaith, that Philip the Tetrarch caſt chaff into a Fountain called Phiala, diſtant 120. ſtadia North-eaſt from Cæſaria, which chaff being carried under ground, was caſt up again at Panium or Dan: whereby it is conjectured, that the firſt Spring of Jordan is from this Fountain called Phiala, from whence Jor and Dan receive their waters.

‖. IV.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the leaſt: ſo often remembred by the Evangeliſts. This City had the honour of Chriſts preſence three years: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he firſt preached and taught the doctrine of our Salvation: according to that notable Prophecy of Eſay 9. The people that walked in darkneſs have ſeen a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the ſhadow of death, upon them hath the light ſhined.

phesied in these words, And thou Capernaum which art lifted up unto Heaven shall be brought down to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatness of that City: for it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some marks of this Cities magnificence in St. Jeroms time, as himself confesseth; it being then a reasonable Burgh or Town: yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Brochard, Breidenbech, and Saliniac affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor Fishermens houses.

Matth. 4. Mark 7. Luke 8.

The Region of ten principal Cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Mark and Luke also remembred; but I find no agreement between the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Pliny himself confesseth; for Marius Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the Mountain Casius in Casiotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœlosyria, all Palestina, and Judæa.

Niger. comment. Asia 4. f. 503.

Plin. l. 5. c. 18.

Opotos a City standing in the Valley of Cœlosyria, watered by Chrysorons, as Damascus is. Plin. l. 5.

Pliny also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth four of them, to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotos, Raphana, then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I gheſs, Amona rather, because it was the chief City of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptolo. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, antiently known by the name of Bethsan; for the sixth, he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlosyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleusia:) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, near the River of Hieromaix. This River Ortelius takes to be the River Jaboc: which bounded Gad and Manasseh over Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Jaboc entreth the same Sea between Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh, he nameth * Hippos, or Hippion, a City so called of a Colony of Horsmen there garrison'd by Herod, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasseh over Jordan. For the eighth, Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region over Jordan, called Perea. For the ninth, Gelasa, which Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlosyra by Josephus, Hegesippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomy (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and last, Pliny nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a Camel. But the Collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which make them to be these; Cæsarea Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes, Nephtalim, Sephet, Chorazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein, and give no reason for their opinion. One place of the Evangelist S. Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract between Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed again from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the middest of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, between Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountains Tracones, otherwise Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neer the same distance, which may be each way forty English miles.

* Pliny hath Hippion Dion, for which Volaterran reads Hippidion. Ortelius takes them for two Cities.

§. V.

Of Hamath.

But to look back again towards Libanus, there is seated neer the foot thereof the City of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adjoyning taketh name: the same which Josephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: a Jacobus Zeigler, Iturea. Iturea Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephtali, per montem Libanum usque Trachones. The Countrey of Iturea, saith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis, Iturea, he mistakes the seat of this Region: and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Iturea (which Hegesippus calls Perea, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it self is far more to the East than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Traconitis lieth between Cæsarea Philippi, and the Mountains Trachones: which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is seated under Cæsarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Cœlosyria, beyond the Mountains Trachones, which b Jerom upon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phœnicia, and Neptalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our Translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numb. 34. 8. and Numb. 13. 22. and in Ezek. 47. 16. In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of Promise, these being the words: From Mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) until it come to Hamath: In the second place thus: So they went up, and searched out the Land from the Wilderness of Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath: Then in Ezekiel; The West part also shall be the great Sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath: that is, the coast of the Sea shall be the West border from the Southermost part of the Holy Land, till you come directly over against Hamath Northward: from

* The Septuagint write it Ammath, Jerome Emath, Josephus Amath: Jos. 19. 35. Chammath, cap. 21. ver. 34. Chammath-Dor, in the first of Chro. 6. 76. Chammon, 2 King. 14. 8. Chammath-Ichuda, as Junius reads it, whereas also for further distinction there is added [in Israel] to note, that it was of old belonging to Juda, though seated in Israel, that is, in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes: the other Chamath, being in Syria Soba.

b So Jerom in his Comment on Amos 6. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seems for distinction from the other in Nephtalim, though Mat. Beroaldus, rejecting Jerom, rath r follows the opinion of Zeigler, above mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the same City which in Joshua 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephtalim, was also called Chamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath, were framed) may be gathered, partly because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chamath-Tseba, as this (as it may seem by Josh. 21. 32.) was Chamath-Dor, and Chamath-Juda, as we have noted, 2 Reg. 24. Secondly, because Num. 34. 8. and also Ezek. 47. 10. Chamath in the North-side of the Holy Land is placed too neer the West corner, to be that Chamath-Isoha: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Moses to name never a place East-ward along all the breadth of the Holy Land until we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hor. Num. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon East-ward in this North-side, they make him to name divers Towns, first Chamath, then Tseda, then Ziphron, and lastly, Chatsar-henan, a thing most unlikely: seeing Israel had little or nothing East-ward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needs expound Hor to be one of the Hills neer Sidon, and so those Towns as they are named, to lie in order on the North-side of Asher, Nephtalim, and Manasses: and in like manner those in Ezekiel, first, Cheelon, then Chamath, and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tsedad, Chauran, Chatsar-henan.

whence if a line be drawn to the Sea, it will touch the walls of Zidon: which is the c Northwest corner of the Holy Land. Now that this Hamath, or Hammath, which Moses also made the confine of the Holy Land, is that of Nephtalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of d Rehob adjoyning, prove it: the other Hamath, or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the fore-named Mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Ituræa, witness e Stella and Laicstan; and not that in Nephtalim, where f Jonathas Maccabæus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night, c Of which Jos. 19. 35.

d Which Rehob, or Rechob, in Jos. 19. 28. is placed in Asher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephtalim.
e Tilemanno, Stella and Peter Laicstan in their tables of the Holy land.
f Jos. ant. 13. 8.

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Ituræa (and therefore it is said to be finitima Galileæ Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the Mountains Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the Plains of the Territory of Ituræa; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch, or President, both of Ituræa and Traconitis: both which are over Jordan towards the East. But Chemath in Nephtalim, is on the West side of Jordan towards the Mediterran Sea.

The Country Ituræa was so called of Jethur, one of the sons of Ishmael: it is placed in the bounds of Cœlosyria, and Arabia * the Desart.

* That it doth properly belong to Arabia, the name of Jethur, Ishmaels son, whose issue settled in the Arabia's, may in part give witness. Also the place of the 1 Chron. 5. 19. confirms it, where Jethur is named among the Hagarens, against whom the Reubenites and Gadites made war, and whose country they possest in the time of Jeroboam, as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conquest of the Amalekites, 1 Chron. 5. 10. where the country is placed at the East of Gilead.

The people Ituræi were valiant and war-like men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Ituræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Yew the Ituræans bows were made.

This City Chamath, or Hamath in Nephtalim, seems to have been as antient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amatheus the eleventh son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tohu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hammath in Nephtalim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subjugation Tohu rejoyced, because Hadadeser, whom the Damasceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tohu fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many antient vessels of gold, silver, and brass.

But it seemeth that David in such great success would not have had peace with Tohu, if he had been King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tsoba: which City Solomon after his Fathers death made himself Master of, as a part of the lands (a in the larger and conditional promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While S. Jerom lived, it remained a City well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

a Of the larger promise expresst, Deu. 1. 7. where Euphrates is named for one of the bounds: See cap. 7. sect. 2. Hieron. de locis Hebr.

‖. VI.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and divers other Towns.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath, towards Jordan, standeth the City Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountain Daphnis: which falleth into the Lake of Merom. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Jericho: and delivered to Nebuchodonosor: who to be avenged of Zedekia's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the Princes his children to be slain in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that ever he should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in Iron chains, he was led a slave to Babylon, in which state he ended his life. Of which seldom exampled calamity, though not in express words, Jeremy the Prophet foretold him in Jerusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly speaking in the person of God; I will bring him to Babel, to the Land of the Chaldæans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein. Jerom. 52. 11, &c. Ezek. 21. 52.

There are, besides these before remembred, many other strong Cities in Nephtalim, as that which is called a Cedes; there are two other of the same name, one in b Issachar, another in Juda, of which Jos. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is known by the addition of c Nephtalim, as Judg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Jos. 20. 7. Kedesh in Galilea in monte Nephtali: Josephus calls it Cedesis, and in S. Jerom's time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

a Or, Kedish, Jos. 19. 37. & 10. 7. & 21. 32. item. Jud. 4. 6.

c Sometime Kedesh in Galilea, 1 Chro 6. 76. Jos 12. 22. 2 Reg. 15. 29.

After the King thereof, among other of the Canaanites, perished by the hand of Joshua, it was made a City of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barac born; who overthrew the Army of the second Jabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possest by Teglatphalasser, when he wasted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had imbraced the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seat, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some four Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many years the inexpugnable Fortress of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritimate, neer it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated Northward neer Sephet, this is to be noted, that there are (‖) divers places of this name in Palæstine, all scituate on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelsum; Ramath with the Hebrews is high.) Also that from this Rama, Jos. 19. 36. they read Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers Towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arema. From Sephet towards the West, they place * Bethsemes, of which Josh. 19. 38. which ‖ See in Benjamin, and in Ephraim.

* Other Cities there were of this name, (which is as much as domus solis) as that in Juda, 2 Kings. 14. 15. where Joash King of the ten Tribes overcame Amasia of Juda, of which also understand the place, Jos. 21. 16. and 1 Sam. 6 14. and 2 Chron. 29. 18. A third, as it seems was in Dan. 1 Kin. 4. 9. which Josh. 19. 41. is written Hirshemes, which is much as Civitas solis. Judg. 1. 31.

defended it self against Nepthalim, Jud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet, towards the East, was Bethanath, who also kept their City from the Nepthalims.

Adjoyning to which standeth Carthan, * or Kiriathajim, a City of the Levites not far from the Mountain out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi, a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place, or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the † Evangelists.

* So it appears by comparing of the places Jos. 21. 32. & 1 Chr. 6. 76. Adrichomius both here and elsewhere, deceived by the double name, makes two of one: although I deny not but that there was another Kiriathajim in Reuben, of which Jos. 13. 9. † Mark. 3. Matth. 10. Acts 1. Matth. 5. 6, 7.

Adjoyning to these are Magdalel, a place of strength, ‖ and Mesaloth, of which we read, that it was forced by Baccides in the time of the * Maccabees: also (according to Adricomius) one of the two Berotha's of Nephtalim. For Adricomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, † one neer Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (upon a weak conjecture out of Joseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neer the waters of Merom; because the Kings that joyned with Jabin against Josua, which encamped at the Waters of Merom. Jos. 11. 5. are by Josephus said to have encamped at the City Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedesa superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adricomius placeth the Region of Berim neer Abela (of which Abela, or Abil-Beth Mahacah, we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 Sam. 20. 14. where some read Abel & Bethmahacah, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, (& omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berei: for Shebah being of Benjamin (in which Tribe also there is a City called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the Men of that City after him.

To the North of Berotha of Nepthalim standeth Sebarim under Lybanus, remembred by Ezek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, neer the Waters of Merom, or Samochonitis, the City of Sisara, Lieutenant of the Army of the second Jabin: from whence not far off, towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong City: besides many others, whereof I find no particular story of importance: as Ser in Jos. c. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Assedim and Ser. Then Adama, which they call Edama: also Hion, which they call Ahion, of which in the books of Kings. Then the strong City of Cinneroth, after called Gennezareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberius in the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which ‖ Mac. 9. 2. also divers others, named Jos. 19. as Ucuca, or Cukkok, Horem and Azanothtabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Josua, Jerzon, Lakkum, Jepnael, Heleb, and * Raccath; which two last they place neer Cæsarea Philippi: To these they add out of Josua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Junius readeth Fossa Adamæi, making it no Town, but a Ditch cast by some of Adameth, as it seems; or at least the custody of which March or Limit belonging to the Town. To these out of Num. 34. 10. they add Sephana, which 1 Sam. 30. 21. seems to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the latter out of Jos. 19. 33. it may appear by Junius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediana, and for the later Quercetum. The City of † Nepthalim, which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naason neer unto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, Tob. 7. 7. but in the Greek Text there is no sign, neither of the one nor of the other.

† In the place, 1 Reg. 4. it is, which also they bring to prove that there was a City called Nepthalim, as is evident by the following Verses: the Tribe of Nepthalim is meant, and not any City of that name.

* This Raccath or Racath, Junius thinks that it is the same with Karthan (one of these being made of the other by transposition of letters) of which Karthan we have noted already, that it is also Kiriatajim.

SECT. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the Sons of Jacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai, 57400 able Men, besides Women, Children, and aged unable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000 fit to bear arms: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the River Chison South-ward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore; of which Joseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbaset, of * which Jos. 19. 11. Jekonam, or Jocneham (whose King was † slain by Josua, and the City was given to the Levites:) and Gaba, after called the City of Horsemen, of a Regiment their garrison'd by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of Men, exceeding antient and magnificent, ‖ burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lievetenant of the Roman Army. Adricomius makes it the birth-City of * Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

* Jos. 12. 22. † Jos. 12 bel. 19. ‖ Jos. 2. bel. 22. * Judg. 12. 12.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Jos. 19. 15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser † Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted Water into Wine: the native City of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it self against Zabulon. Then Bersabe, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far from hence standeth Shimron of Meron, whose King was slain by Josua.

† The greater Cana is in the Tribe of Aster. Jos. 22. 2. Nathaniel is said to be of Cana in Galilee. Of Simon it may be doubted: for Angelus Caninus reads Mat. 20. 4. Simon Cananites, which word (Luke 6.) he thinketh to be expounded by Zelotes.

Then Damna, or Dimna, a City of the Levites: then Noa, or rather Neha, of which Jos. 19. 13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joseph found his Brethren feeding their flocks: the same wherein Elizæus, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the East, they imagine ‖ Amthar, or Amathar: then Remmon of the Levites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is ‖ The Hebrew Hammethoar, (for which the Vulgar hath Anither, Jos. 19. 13. Vatablus qua gyrat: Junius joyns it with the word going before it, Rimmo-nemo Methoarum, Mat. 8. 11. Mark 1. 6. Luke 4. 10. expounds, and reads

Bethsaida,

Bethſaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, ſcituate on the Galilæan Sea, and watered by the ſprings of Capernaum, the native Cities of the Apoſtles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Chriſt did many miracles, but theſe people being no leſs incredulous than the Capernaims, and others, received the ſame Curſe of threatned miſeries, as, Wo be unto thee, Bethſaida, &c.

Alongſt the Weſt border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethſaida, was the ſtrong Caſtle of Magdalum, the habitation of Mary Magdelen, not long ſince ſtanding.

And beyond it the ſtrong aud high ſeated City of Jotapata, fortified by Joſephus in the Roman War: but in the end, after a long ſiege, ſurpriſed by Veſpaſian, who ſlaughtered many thouſand of the Citizens, and held 1200 Priſoners, whereof Joſephus the Hiſtorian was one.

* The names of the chief Cities ſcated about this Sea, or Lake thorow which Jordan runneth, were Capernaum, Tyberias, Bethſaida, Gadara, and they add Cinereth, which in fore-times gave name unto the Lake and Country, Matth. 9. Luke 5. Joſ. Ant. 18. 3. Joſeph. 10. 15. Adrich. in Zab.

The laſt and greateſt of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Genezzareth, within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilæan Sea alſo changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, ſo named in the honour of Tiberius Cæſar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greateſt and laſt of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew from the Toll or Cuſtom-houſe, to be an Apoſtle; and neer unto it raiſed the Daughter of Jairus from Death: it was built (as Joſephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the Brother of Philip, in the beginning of the raign of Tiberius Cæſar, in the moſt fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres; Quam juxta noſtras leges (ſaith he) ad ſeptem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our Law he ſhould be ſeven days held as unclean, who inhabited in ſuch a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Joſephus it appears, that this Tiberias, is not (as ſome have thought) the ſame as the old Cinnereth, which was ſeated, not in Zabulon, but in Nepthalim.

Neer unto this Tiberias at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Veſpatian the Emperour encamped againſt Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-weſt, is Bethulia, ſeated on a very high hill, and of great ſtrength, famous by the ſtory of Holofernes and Judith, ſuch as it is. Neer which ſtandeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adjoyning unto it Capharath, fortified by Joſephus againſt the Romans: and Japha, an exceeding ſtrong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury ſlew 15000 of the Citizens; and carried away above two thouſand priſoners.

Joſ. in vit. ſua. Joſeph. 2. Bel. 25.

On the South ſide are the Cities of Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Joſephus in his own life, then Jafie, according to Adrichomius (of which Joſ. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Japha of which we ſpeak but now out of Joſephus. Jideala, of which Joſ. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Jadela: under it Weſt-ward, Legio, (afterward a Biſhops ſeat) and the City Belma, in antient times exceeding ſtrong, remembred Judith 7. 3. otherwiſe Chelma. Between Legio and Nazeret is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth-City of Zebedæus, Alphæus, James and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Joſephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, ſaith Hegeſippus, and Hierome, was called Diocæſaria, the City of Joachim and Anna the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Joſephus ſpeaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he ſaith Urbium Galileæ arum Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Veſpaſian ere he wan it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the Regal ſeat of the nether Galilee, and ſurrounded it with a ſtrong Wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to ſay as Imperial, ſaith Joſephus; and it is now but a Caſtle called Zaphet.

Joſ. 21. 35. otherwiſe Kiſloth Thabor, as Junius thinks upon Joſ. 19. 12. whence 1 Chron. 6. 77. it is called Thaher.

To the South-weſt of this Sephoris, or Diocæſaria, was that bleſſed place of Nazareth, the City of Mary the Mother of Chriſt; in which he himſelf was conceived: it ſtandeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this City he abode chiefly four and twenty years, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Chriſtians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbiſhoprick in the following age. Neer unto it are the Cities Buria (afterward well defended againſt the Turks) and Nahalal, of which Joſ. 19. 15. and Judg. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalol: and Joſ. 21. 35. where it is a City of the Levites; near the Sea adjoyning to the River of Chiſon is Sarid, noted in Joſua for the uttermoſt of Zabulon.

Johan. de Monteville, c. 4. & 20.

In this Territory of Zabulon there are divers ſmall Mountains: but Tabor is the moſt renowned, by the apparition of Moſes and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Chriſt in the preſence of Peter, James, and John: unto whom Moſes and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Empreſs Helen built a ſumptuous Chappel.

Joſeph ant 18. 3 & in vita ſua.

In the chief River of Zabulon is Chiſon, which riſing out of Tabor, runneth with one ſtream Eaſtward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another ſtream Weſtward into the great Sea. This River of Chiſon where it riſeth, and ſo far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the ſame which Ptolomy calleth Chorſeus: though others diſtinguiſh them, and ſet Chorſeus by Cæſaria Paleſtinæ. There is a ſecond Torrent or Brook that riſeth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a River riſing out of the Fountains of Capernaum, which falleth alſo into the ſame Sea, and near Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the City, from which it paſſeth Eaſtward to Bethſaida, and ſo joyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jepthael, which Joſua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

SECT. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISSACHAR.

THe next adjoyning Territory to Zabulon, to the South and South-weſt, was Iſſachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increaſed in Egypt, as appeared by their muſters at mount Sinai, 54400 able and warlike Men, who leaving their bodies with the reſt in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land, 64300.

The firſt City of this Tribe near the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, diſtant from Tiberias eight Engliſh miles, or ſomewhat more; a City wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upſtart, John the Son of Levi) took Arms againſt Joſephus the Hiſtorian, then Governour of both Galilees. This City was firſt taken by Caſſius, and 3000 Jews carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficulty by Veſpaſian, who entred it by the Sea-ſide, having firſt beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the Sword all ſorts of People, and of all ages; ſaving that his fury being quenched with the Rivers of Blood running through every ſtreet, ſtreet, he reſerved the remainder for Slaves and Bond-Men.

Joſ. 21. 28. Kiſheon, which is called Kedeſh. Joſua 19. 1 Sam. 4. 1. 1 Sam. 3. 19. 1 Kings 20. 26. In the later two places Junius makes Aphec in Aſſer, according to Joſ. 19. 30. in the firſt he placeth it in Juda, out of Joſ. 15. 53.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceſſion, or Ciſhion of the Levites, and then Iſſachar, remembred in the firſt of Kings, c. 4. v. 17. then Abes, or Ebets, Joſ. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Joſ. 19. 21. otherwiſe Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 37. or Jarmuth, Joſ. 21. 19. this alſo was a City of the Levites, from whoſe Territory the Mountains of Gilboe take beginning: and range themſelves to the Mediterran-Sea, and towards the Weſt, as far as the City Jeſrael, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheſes, or Bethpaſſes, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, near which Saul ſlew himſelf: under thoſe, Aphec, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Iſſachar: between which and Suna, he ſaith, that the Philiſtims incamped againſt Iſrael, and afterward againſt Saul: a Land thirſty of blood, for herein alſo, ſaith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli aſſiſting Benhadad, incountered Achab, and were overthrown and ſlaughtered: to whom the King of Iſrael made a moſt memorable anſwer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhaded, Let not him that girdeth his harneſs, boaſt himſelf as he that putteth it off: meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to preceed it. In the year following in the Fields, as they ſay, adjoyning to this City, was the ſame vainglorious Syrian utterly broken and diſcomfited by Achab: and 100000 footmen of the Aramites or Syrians ſlain: before which overthrow the Servants and Counſellors of Benhadad (in diriſion of the God of Iſrael) told him, That the Gods of Iſrael were Gods of the Mountains: and therefore if they fought with them in the Plains, they ſhould overcome them.

1 King. 20. 23.

Under Aphec, towards the Sea, they ſet the City of Eſdrelon, in the Plains of Galilee; called alſo the great Field of Eſdrelon, and Maggeddo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be ſeen, ſaith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After theſe are the Cities of Caſaloth, of which 1 Mac. 9. 2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim, of the Levites, and Sceſima, or Shabatſima, the Weſt border of Iſſachar, of which Joſ. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coaſt, there is found the Caſtle of Pilgrims: a ſtrong Caſtle invironed with the Sea, ſometime the Storehouſe and Magazine of the Chriſtians, and built by the Earl of Saint Giles, or Tolouſe.

Judith 1. 8. & 7. 3. 1 Chr. 6. 73. Joſ. 21. 19.

From the Caſtle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and at the farthermoſt ſhore beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chiſon, where Elijah aſſembled all the Prophets and Prieſts of Baal, and prayed King Achab, and the People aſſembled, to make trial whether the God of Iſrael, or the Idol of Baal were to be worſhipped, by laying a Sacrifice without Fire on the Altar: which done, the Prieſts of Baal prayed, and cut their own fleſh after their manner, but the Fire kindled not, while Elijah in deriſion told them, that their God was either in purſuit of his Enemies, not at leiſure, or perchance aſleep, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the Fire kindled, notwithſtanding that he had cauſed the people to caſt many Veſſels of Water thereon: by which miracle the People incenſed, ſlew all thoſe Idolaters on the banks of Chiſon adjoyning.

At the Foot of this Mountain to the North, ſtandeth Caiphas, built, as they ſay, by Caiphas the High-Prieſt. It is alſo known by the name of Porſina, and Porphyria, ſometime a Suffragan Biſhops ſeat. Returning again from the Sea-coaſt towards Tyberias, by the banks of Chiſon, there are found the City of Hapharaim, or Aphraim, and the Caſtles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chiſon: a beautiful City while it ſtood, in the Gates whereof Chriſt raiſed from death the Widows only Son. Luke 7.

Then Seon or Sion, named Joſ. 19. between the two Hills of Hermon, in Iſachar: beyond it ſtandeth Endor, famous by reaſon of the Inchantreſs that undertook to raiſe up the body of Samuel at the inſtigation of Saul.

Beyond it ſtands Annaharath and Rabbith, named Joſ. 19. v. 19, 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Joſ. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This City (which ſtretcheth it ſelf over Chiſon) was a City of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela, ſituate near the Caves of thoſe two Thieves which ſo greatly moleſted Galilee in Herods time. It joyneth on one ſide to the Mountain of Iſſachar, or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Jeſrael: which Valley continueth it ſelf from Bethſan, or Scythopolis, the Eaſt border of Iſſachar, even to the Mediterran-Sea: two parts whereof are incloſed by the Mountains of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon and the River Chiſon on the North. In theſe * Plains Gideon overthrew the Midianites, and herein they think, Saul fought againſt the Philiſtims, Achab againſt the Syrians, and the Tartars againſt the Saracens.

* Called Campus Magnus. 1 Mac. 12. 49. and Harbatha for Harabath. 1 Mac. 5. 23, & 9. 2. Judg. 6. 1 Sam. 31. 1 King. 20.

SECT. VII.

THE HALF OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

‖ I.

Of the bounds of this half Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therſa, and others.

THe next Tribe which joyneth it ſelf to Iſſachar towards the South, is the half of Manaſſe, on the Weſt ſide of Jordan. Manaſſes was the firſt begotten of Joſeph, the eleventh Son of Jacob. His Mother was an Egyptian, the Daughter of Putiphar, Prieſt and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manaſſes, with his Brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongſt the Sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manaſſe there were encreaſed in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai. 32200 able men: all which being conſumed in the Deſarts, there entred of their iſſues, 52700 bearing Arms. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manaſſe, was bounded by Jordan on the Eaſt, and Dora, upon the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt, Jeſrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The firſt and principal City which ſtood in this Territory was Bethſan, ſometime Nyſa, ſaith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurſe there buried, of the ſame name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Aſia the leſs, and pierc't into the South, to the uttermoſt of Cæloſyria, they built this City a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians, given by the Greeks. Plin. l. 5. c. 18.

Theſe barbarous Northern people conſtrained the Jews to fight againſt their own Nation and kindred, by whoſe hands when they had obtained victory, they themſelves ſet on the Jews which ſerved them, and ſlew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmoſt towards the South of Cæloſyria: and Strabo joyns it to Galilee. It is ſeated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aquilone ad montes Acrabitenæ, ſaith Zeigler. But I find it in the Eaſt part of the Valley of Jeſræel near Jordan: after that Jordan ſtrengtheneth it ſelf again into a River, leaving the Sea, or Lake Genezareth. Notwithſtanding Montanus deſcribes it far to the Weſt, and towards the Mediterran Sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laieſtan, Adrichome, and all other the beſt Authors. This City was the greateſt of all thoſe of Decapolis: but the Children of Manaſſe could not expel the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an Enemy, or Beth-ſan, the Houſe of an Enemy.

Judg. 1. Joſ. 17. ac Bell. ſacr. Over the Walls of this Beth-ſan the Philiſtines hung the body of Saul, and his Sons ſlain at Gilboe. It had, while the Chriſtian Religion flouriſhed in thoſe parts, an Archbiſhop, who had nine other Biſhops of his Dioceſs, numbred by Tyrius, in his fourteenth Book and twelfth Chapter: but the ſame was afterwards tranſlated to Nazareth. The later Travellers in thoſe parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubbiſh and the ruins of that City, goodly Pillars, and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witneſs the ſtately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and deſolate Village.

Hierom. in Epiſt. ad Evangr. & in Loc. Heb. From Beth-ſan keeping the way by Jordan, they find an antient City called Salem, which City the antient Rabbins, ſaith Jerome, do not find to be the ſame with Jeruſalem: there being in the time of Hierome and ſince, a Town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13.18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth tranſvitque in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read venit incolumis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3.13. where it is ſaid, that John was by, baptizing in Ænon near Salem, may ſomewhat ſtrengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which St. John ſpeaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shuhal: of which we read, 1 Sam. 13.17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6. 12. of Shulammites, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem near Ænon, it hath no probability.

This City Bezek, by the place Judg. 1. 3. ſeemeth to have been in Juda. Joſeph. ant. 6. c. 5. 1 Sam. c. 11. Not far from thence where they place Salem, they find Bezech, the City of Adonibezec. Joſephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul aſſembled the ſtrength of Iſrael and Juda, to the number of 330000 when he meant to relieve Jabeſh Gilead, againſt Naaſh the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to ſuffer their right Eyes to be thruſt out. Near Bezech is the City of Bethbera, or rather Beth-bara, of which Judg. 7. 24. in the ſtory of Gideon: and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof ſtood an Altar conſecrated to Baal, which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that Stone, on which Abimelech the Baſtard ſlew his ſeventy Brothers; a Heatheniſh cruelty, practiſed by the Turk to this day: and not far hence, between the Village of Aſophon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus overthrew Alexander King of the Jews, and ſlaughtered, as Joſephus numbreth them, 3000; but according to Timagenes 50000: after which victory, as Ptolomy paſt by the Villages of the Jews, he ſlew all their Women, and cauſed the young Children to be ſod in great Caldrons, that the reſt of the Jews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be Men-eaters, and ſtrike them with the greater terror.

Joſ. l. 13. c. 21. Towards the Weſt and on the border of Iſſachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Heliſæus the Prophet, numbred among thoſe places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon, to whoſe charge alſo Tahanac belonged, a place of great ſtrength, which at the firſt reſiſted Joſua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites.

* This Aner, Junius upon 1 Chr. 6. 70. makes to be the ſame with Tahanac, of which Joſ. 21. 25. Hierome names it from Aner the Conſederate of Abraham Gen. 14. 13. Joſ. 12. 17.

In the body of this Territory of Manaſſe, but ſomewhat nearer Jordan than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Therſa, whoſe King was one of thoſe that Joſua ſlew: which the Kings of Iſrael uſed for their Regal ſeat, till ſuch time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her Sons health: who knowing her, though ſhe were diſguiſed, told her of her Sons death. 1 King. 14.

The ſecond was Thebes near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame: in the aſſault of the Tower of this Town, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Baſtard Abimelec was wounded by a weighty Stone, thrown by a Woman over the Wall, who diſpairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to ſlay him out-right, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he periſhed by the ſtroke of a Woman. But others ſet this City in Ephraim near Sichem, or Neapolis. Judg. 9. 50. 54.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoyning is call Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies, or governments in Judæa) for which Hierom, 1 Mac. 5. reads Arabathena: but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Iſidore calls it Agrabat. This City had one of the largeſt Territories of all Palæſtine belonging to the Governour thereof. Joſephus remembreth it often, as in his ſecond book of the Jews wars, c. 11. 25. 28. and elſewhere. Hier. Mar. l. c. 5.

The difference between a Tetrarchy and a Toparchy, was, that the firſt was taken for a Province, and the other for a City with ſome leſſer Territory adjoyning; and a Tetrarch is the ſame with Præſes in Latine, and Preſident in Engliſh, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom; and thereof ſo called. Pliny nameth ſeventeen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and ſo hath the Kingdom of Ireland to this day, Lemſter, Ulſter, Connath, and Munſter. Plin. l. 5. Euſeb. in Chron.

To the South-weſt of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmom of the Levites: but Junius out of Joſ. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that theſe two are but one; and that Jibleham, Joſ. 16. 11. is another name of the ſame City.

Then is Jezael a Regal City, ſet at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboe, towards the South weſt: herein Jezabel, by a falſe accuſation, cauſed Naboth to be ſtoned, to the end ſhe might poſſeſs his Vineyard adjoyning to the City, which Naboth refuſed to ſell, becauſe it was his inheritance from his Father.

Joram alſo was caſt unburied into the ſame field: for which his Mother Jezabel murthered Naboth. 2 Kings 2.

Toward the Sea from Jezael is the City which they call Gaber: in whoſe aſcent as Ahaziah King of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had ſlain Joram, he was wounded with the ſhot of an Arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adjoyning. The Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Gur. 2 Kings 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Joſias was ſlain by Necho King of Egypt, in a War unadviſedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Aſſyria againſt the King thereof, by the commandment of God: whom Joſias thought to reſiſt in his paſſage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Maggedo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whoſe King was ſlain Judg. 1. 5. Joſ. 12. 17.

slain among the rest by Josua: yet they defended their City for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomy calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land, delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which passeth by Maggeddo, he understandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges. Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the Waters of Maggeddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

But seeing that antient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia even to Sebaste, or Samaria; and Strabo far beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Josephus calls Cæsaria Palæstinæ, a City of Phœnicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Gaza: seeing also Ptolomy sets down Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Judæa, this River running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomy in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorseus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Maggeddo, Subimbre at this day.

§. II.

Of Cæsaria Palestinæ, and some other Towns.

FRom Maggeddo toward the West, and near the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious City of Cæsaria Palestinæ: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the World: For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish't Marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any Age: which, because the Materials were fetcht from far, and the weight of the Stones was such, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Josephus's own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ classi recipiendæ sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis verò octodecim, altitudine novempedali: fuerunt quædam etiam majora, minora alia; To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compast in a Bay wherein a great Fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fadom deep: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen frot broad, and nine foot thick: and some bigger, some lesser. To this he added an arm or cawsie of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: the rest he strengthned with a Stone Wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the Son in Law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intituled the City it self, Cæsaria of Palestine: all which he performed in twelve years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, commanding twenty others under it, saith Tyrius.

Joseph. l. 15. c. 13.

Lib. 4 c. 12. bel. sacr.

St. Jerom nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Galasius, to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptised by St. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. St. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom, making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a God by his flatterers, he was stricken by an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some read, Jos. 1. 2. so called (saith Adricomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Josua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reads in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josua call it Nephith-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macc. 15. 11. placeth this between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the River Cherseus: for so some name the River Corseus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the Son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 1200 Foot-Men, and 8000 Horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200 talents for the ransom of Jonathan Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Dioceses of Cæsaria.

Mac. 1. 13. 14.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Caphernaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they find in these parts near the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome, in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was, whose King was slain by Josua.

Guil. Tyr. debell. sacr. l. 10. c. 6.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of Macchabees, it was called Capharsalama: in the Fields whereof Judas Macchabæus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lievtenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judæa by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was St. Paul carried prisoner from Jerusalem, conducted by 470 Souldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In aftertimes the Army of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vain: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those days with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Assur, saith Brochard. Near unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three days preserved in the body of a Whale.

Mac. 17. 31.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman, wasted with fire and Sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Near unto it is the Mountain of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them: after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

SECT. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and the Name of this Kingdom: and of the invention of Letters aſcribed to them.

BEcauſe theſe five Tribes, of Aſſer, Nepthalim, Zabulon, Iſſachar, and the half of Manaſſe, poſſeſt the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of ſo much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of thoſe Kings which have governed therein: at leaſt ſo many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to poſterity: and that the reſt periſhed, it is not ſtrange: ſeeing ſo many Volumes of excellent learning in ſo long a race and revolution, and in ſo many changes of Eſtates, and Conqueſt of Heathen Princes have been torn, caſt away, or otherwiſe conſumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Coſmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Caſiotis, ends: moſt of them bounding it by Orthoſia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus that falls into the Sea at the Iſland of Aradus, ſomewhat to the North of Orthoſia, and ſtretching from thence alongſt the coaſt of the Mediterran Sea, as far as the River of Chorſeus; which ſeems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggeddo. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budæus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priſcos appellata (ſaith Budæus) quæ nunc Palæſtina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (ſaith he) which now is called Paleſtina of Syria.

Plin. l. 5. c. 29.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia all the Sea-ſide of Judæa, and Palæſtina, even unto Peluſium, the firſt Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœloſyria, which he boundeth not. But for my ſelf, I take a middle courſe, and like beſt of Ptolomies deſcription, who was ſeldom deceived in his own art. It had in it, theſe famous Maritimate Cities (beſides all thoſe of the Iſlands) to wit, Aradus, Orthoſia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæſaria Paleſtinæ: and by reaſon of the many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it antiently commanded the Trades of the Eaſtern World: and they were abſolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The antient Regal Seat of thoſe Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the firſt Son of Canaan: and the people then ſubject to that people were called Zidonians; the ſame ſtate continuing even unto Joſua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius alſo confirmeth in his ſecond Book of Vandals wars. But in proceſs of time the City of Tyre adjoyning, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them firſt built, and peopled. Eſay 23.

But after the death of Moſes, and while Joſua yet governed Iſrael, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his Sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (ſay Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and poſſeſt the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (ſo called after the name of his ſecond Son) the uſe of Letters: which alſo Cadmus in his purſuit after his Siſter Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he ſurpriſed Tyre, had ſtoln her thence: of which the Poets deviſed the fable of Jupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that ſtealth was alſo ſuppoſed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the firſt King of Phœnicia: and finds Cadmus his Succeſſor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it ſeemeth Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: becauſe the ſucceſſors of Dido held that name alwaies in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Aſdrubal, Hannibal: whoſe memory Virgil alſo toucheth in theſe Verſes.

Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroque poposcit,
Implevitq; mero pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo, ſoliti.

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl
(Weighty with precious ſtones and maſſie Gold)
To flow with Wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-Father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it ſeems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Anceſtor to theſe Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the Son of Neptune by Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Son Thelegonus, according to Euſebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops's time, ſaith St. Auguſtine, Moſes left Egypt: Agenors ſucceſſor living at once with Joſua. Now that Agenor returned about the ſame time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny; but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Son. But inſtead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonoſor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the ſame Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the uſe of of Letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of learning in Moses's time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his own Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites, who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by Josua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male Children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerful Nations to defend it: the Desarts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistims, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoyning unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josua called the strong City Accho, afterward Ptolomais, Achzib, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those days. Chap. 19. 29.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it self thirteen years against a King of Kings, Nebuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God seemed unresistable) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the Son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Calisthenes derive it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my self, I take it that Phœnix the Son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his Son in Greece, were the Inventers of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinity and Philosophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his Sons were Africans; whence Lucan, Lucan. l. 5. Phœnices primi (famæ si creditur) ausi,

3. Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.

Phœnicians first (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the Son of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phœnician.

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros. Athen. l. Dipnos.

If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very antient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians again subscribe to none of these reports: but affirm constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintain, that the antient Gaules taught the Greeks the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gaules, and that they sent their Sons hither to be by them instructed in all kind of learning? Joseph. contra Appionem.

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all; for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt and Assyria, and he himself was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the general Flood: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Books after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans, a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutchions, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations: Jura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural Laws are common, and general. Inviscon.

SECT. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

But whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the Books of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Josua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phasis governed Phœnicia.

In Jeremies time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Jeremy speaketh Cap. 27.

of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of several Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes's Fleet, or rather, as I suppose those 300 Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Jeremies time, they were subjected by Nebuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Jeremiah prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his fourteenth Book.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Darius, and that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130 years and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this Man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himself by the instigation of his subjects (who foresaw their utter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. Lib. 4.

Of this Strato, Athenæus, out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a Man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certain Games and Prizes for Women-Dancers, and Singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, St. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were neer him with an Army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhearing to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himself, but fainting in the execution, his Wife being present, wrested the Sword out of his hand, and slew him: which done, she also therewith pierced her own body, and died. Athen. l. 12. c. 13. Hieron. l. 1. com. Jovin

After Alexander was possest of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence he gave the Kingdom to Hephæstion to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen, no less vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this honour might be conferred on some one of the blood and race of their antient Kings: and presented unto him Balonimus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Justine, Abdolomius, and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: though otherwise a wise Man, and exceeding just.

These were the antient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterwards changed into Popular or Aristocratical: and by times and turns subjected to the Emperors of the East, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formrly delivered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre: who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Josephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Josephus and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesius, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the Son of Sirach mentioneth in his forty and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83. Cap. 46. Præ. Evan. l. 9. c. 4.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Masons and Carpenters, to perform his buildings in Jerusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Solomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great sums of Money, but also he joyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 Talents of Gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8 Chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his third book, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greeks: and in Zonaras, Tome the first. This Prince seemeth to be very mighty and magnificent, he despised the twenty Towns which Solomon offered him: he defended himself against that victorious King David: and gave his Daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astaroth, the Idol of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53 years. 2 Sam. 5. &c. 2 Sam c. 5. 2 Kin. 1. 9. 10. 1 Chro. 14. 2 Chr. 2. 8. 9.

Baleastartus, whom Theop. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned seven years, according to Josephus. 1 Kin. 11. Theoph. 7. years.

Abdastartus the eldest Son of Baleastartus, governed nine years, and lived but twenty years, according to Josephus: but after Theophilus, he reigned twelve years, and lived 54 who being slain by the four Sons of his own Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdom twelve years.

Astartus Brother to Abdastartus, recoverd the Kingdom from this Usurper, and reigned twelve years.

Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third Brother, followed Astartus, and ruled nine years, and lived in all fifty four. Joseph. 54. Theoph. 58.

Phelles the forth Son of Baleastartus, and Brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned eight Months, and lived fifty years. Theoph.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) Son to the third Brother Astarimus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddess Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his Father and slaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned thirty two years; the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose Daughter Jezebel Achab married. Joseph. 32. Theoph. 32.

Badezor, or Bazor, the Son of Ithobalus, or Ethbaal, Brother to Jezebel, succeeded his Father and reigned six years, and lived in all forty five. 1 Kings 16. 31. Joseph. 6. years. Theoph. 26.

lion, and Barca, and two Daughters, Eliſa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father forty Years, and lived fifty ſix. In the ſeventh Year of whoſe reign, Eliſa ſailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143 Years and eight Months after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289 Years after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome; and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido muſt be far out of ſquare. For Pygmalion covetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his Siſter Eliſa, ſlew him traterouſly as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe Juſtine and Virgil: at the Altar: whereupon Eliſa fearing to be diſpoiled of her Huſbands Treaſure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforeſaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to purſue, he was by his Mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arreſted. Barca accompanied his Siſter, and aſſiſted her in the erection of Carthage: and from him ſprang that noble Family of the Barcæ in Africa, of which race deſcended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, becauſe of her man-like acts: other from Jedidia, a ſurname of Solomon.

Eluleus ſucceeded Pygmalion, and reigned thirty ſix Years: the ſame that overthrew the Fleet of Salmanaſſer, in the Port of Tyre: notwithſtanding which he continued his ſiege before it on the Land ſide five Years, but in vain.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himſelf to be as wiſe as Daniel: and that he knew all ſecrets (ſaith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his twenty eighth Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was ſlain in that long ſiege of Nebuchodonoſor: who ſurrounded and attempted Tyre thirteen Years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned ten Years a tributary, perchance, to Nebuchodonoſor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, ſucceeding each other: Firſt by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Prieſt, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them ſome ſeven Years, and odd Months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one Year: after him Merbalus ſent from Babylon, four Years; after him Irom, ſent thence alſo, twenty Years. In the ſeventeenth of whoſe reign Cyrus began to govern Perſia.

SECT. III.

Of Boſius his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledg of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a diſcourſe of divers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under Heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable and the ſame for ever; yet whereas the ſaid Bozius, inforcing here-hence, that the proſperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forſaking the true Religion; to prove this his aſſertion, ſuppoſeth the Tyrians to have been Edumæans, deſcended from Eſau, Jacobs Brother: firſt, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flouriſhed moſt in her antient glory, was in any ſort truly devout and religious. But to this end (beſides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hirams good affection, when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectural arguments; whereof the ſtrongeſt is their pedigree and deſcent: it being likely in his opinion, that the poſterity of Eſau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeavours to ſhew, partly by weak reaſons, painfully ſtrained from ſome affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others, witneſs, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Iſlands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Zidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Conſidering therefore that all the coaſt of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elah and Eſiongaber; or under the Amalekites who deſcended of Amalec the Nephew of Eſau, whoſe chief City was Madian, ſo called of Madian the Son of Abraham by Cethura, whoſe poſterity did people it: the conſequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the Children of Iſrael. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worſhip of Aſtartis, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecides being Phœnicians, themſelves differed much in their Philoſophy from the Idolatrous cuſtoms of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumæans, was an Univerſity, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who diſputed with Job, Religion was ſincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the diſcourſe of Bozius, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deſerves in both very little credit. For, neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Eſau brought up his Children, it is no where found written; but that himſelf was a profane Man, and diſavowed by God, the Scriptures in plain terms expreſs. That his Poſterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the twenty fifth Chapter of the ſecond Book of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the Houſe of Iſrael, ſave only when David and ſome of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in ſubjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of Davids unfriendly behaviour amongſt them, when firſt they were ſubdued? ſurely, it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance between Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with David; even then when Joab ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill intreated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſdom of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotton, and the Edumæans puniſhed, for being ſuch as David in his own days found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the ſame name, lying Eaſt from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoyning to Hus, the countrey of Job: and to Sueh the City of Bildad the Suhite; as both ſuch Chorographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy Text maketh manifeſt. For Job is ſaid to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wiſdom all the People of the Eaſt; not the Inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due due South from Palæstina. True it is, that Eliphaz the Son of Esau had a Son called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those days to take name of their Sons, I no where find. And Ismael also had a Son called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seventh Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalakites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battel to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000 able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerful and numberless must the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoyning could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it self, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being Son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtless was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniory of the Red Sea coast, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places, as Elan and Esiongaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses's time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himself saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs have known it: because he had sojourned long in that Countrey: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable soever, are needless in so manifest a case. For in the 83 Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozius himself confesseth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15. and 19. appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the Children of Asser, Jos. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the curled Seed of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wise Son: we cannot infer that he was of Davids Religion. The Turk hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astaroth and drew Solomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over pesterd, being otherwise apt to yield Silks: as the Andarine Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities. For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiser; who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Israel. For David had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thorow which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and recarry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyrus: so that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to pass, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant, as a Man of peace, to imploy his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozius frames negatively upon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no Man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours; which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecides are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excelleth the Vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wisdom of these Men express any true knowledg of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is so peremptory, that he stileth Men of contrary opinion, Impios Politicos, as if it were impiety to think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded moral honesty, with temporal happiness. Doubtless, this doctrine of Bozius would better have agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foul Idolatry, which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great Battels did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new honour to one of their old Gods? Yea, what one Nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations nations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a sign or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozius, writing against those whom he falsly terms impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among Men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own brains any strange Chimera's of Divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pity it is, that such mad Dogs are oftentimes incouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a Man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

SECT. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Psal. 59. 78. 108. Part. 25.

HAving now past over Phœnicia we come to the next Territory adjoyning, which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second Son of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000, all which dying in the Desarts, (Josua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their Children grown to be able Men, 32500 who sate down on the West side of Jordan; between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan on the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Cæsar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard observeth, the ruines which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Jerusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewen and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sons of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the Son of Antipater: who to flatter Cæsar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Heliseus and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Near Samaria, towards the South, is the hill of Bethel, and a Town of that name: on the top of which Mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden, calves, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

Sichar. Joh. 4, 5. Maborthan. Joseph. 1. ant. 1.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was that antient City of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Peloſa. and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their Sister Dina: and after that, by Abimelec evened with the Soil. Jeroboam raised it up again: and the Damascens a third time cast it down.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhaton, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon Judg of Israel. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Near to this City Judas Maccabæus overthrew Seron and Lysias, Leivetenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified. Jud. 12. 15. 2 King. 13.

Between Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Jos. 10. and Saron, whose King was slain by Josua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cæsarea Palestinæ, extendeth it self alongst the coast as far as Joppe, saith Adrichome: though indeed the name Sarona is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitful plain Region; for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, between Cæsarea and Joppe, but that also betwen the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so St. Jerom upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Assaron: understanding thereby a Plain near Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diospolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judæa, the fifth in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where St. Peter (non sua, sed Christi virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region from Antilybanus to Joppe, Sarona. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Ravens and spoilers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weals, Usurpers of other Princes Kingdoms; who with no other respect led, than to amplifie their own glory, troubled the whole World: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most savage and barbarous Nations. Jos. 12. 18. Acts. 6. Luke 23. Niger. com 4. Asia. fol. 503. 14.

In Diospolis (saith William of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Justinian the Emperour caused a fair Church to be built over his Tomb; these are Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Joppe, per latè patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertranseuntes, Liddam, quæ est Diospolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii usque Of this see more St. George above in this 2. Book, ch. 7. sect. 3. ¶ 5.

usque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, ejus Ecclesiam quum ad honorem ejusdem Martyris, pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustius Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta, ædificari præceperat, &c. They having left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Towns, Antipatris and Joppe, passing over the great open Plain of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis: where the sumptuous Tomb of the famous Martyr St. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romans, High and mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestness and present devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius: by whose testimony we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slain there in an uprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the uprore of the people against him: as fearing least he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had been gathered up, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honourable order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius above-cited witnesseth to have been buried at Lidda or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitriac. S. Jerom affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Lib. 2. c. 11

Selig tom. 6. c. 4.

Neer to Lidda or Diospolis standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the native City of Joseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which bear this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda neer Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adjoyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

See in the Tribe of Benjamin, cap. 12. sect. 1.

1 Sam. 25. 5.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Josephus in his Antiquities, and in the Wars of the Jews. Also Balsalisa for which Junius, 2 Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Shalishæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Junius upon 1 Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Salisha, findeth it in Benjamin.

Ant. 13. 21. de bell. Jud. 1. 6.

On the other side of the Mountains of Ephraim standeth Gosna, one of the Toparchies, or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies, or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies, or Præsidencies of Judæa, which they call Thamnitica, a goodly City, and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the Hill called Gaas; which City and Territory Israel gave unto their Leader Joshua; who also amplified it with buildings, neer which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Jeroms time, and over it the Sun engraven, in memory of that greatest of wonders, which God wrought in Joshua's time.

Judg. 2 9. It is called Thimnath Chores. Jos. 9. 50. Hieron. in locis Hebr.

In the places adjoyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Judas Machabæus with three thousand Jews overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neer to Gaser, or Gezer, which Joshua took, and hung their King; a City of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slain, and the City razed; Solomon rebuilt it.

Mac. 1. 7. 40.

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Jefleti, of which Jos. 16. 3. otherwise Pelethi, whence David had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, under the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountain and City of Silo, whereon the Ark of God was kept so many years, till the Philistims got it.

See in Benjamin. 1 Mac. 9. ult. 1 Kings 4. and see Rama in Benjamin.

To this they joyn the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Jonathan Machabæus inhabited, a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Jerusalem: and is now called Byra.

* Jud. 9. 6. 20. 1 Reg. 11. 27.

Then the Village of Naioth where Samuel prophesied; and neer it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam; after the great overthrow given him. Then Kimhtsaim, of the Levites, of which Jos. 21. 22. which Junius thinks to be the same with Jokmeham, of which 1 Chron. 6. 28. As for Absaloms Baalasor, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it, in the Plain of Chatzor; and finds it in the Tribe of Juda; as Jos. 15. we read of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neer Kedesh, vers. 23. and the other the same as Chetzron, vers. 25.

Vatablus expounds Millo in this place locum pabulum, locum munitionum, aut arcem Jerosolymitanæ atque strateliæ, 2 King. 15. Jos. 17. 15. 16.

In this Tribe also they find the City of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, joyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelek King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Solomon raised a Tribute upon the people. But it seems that * Mello, or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadel: and so Junius, for domus Millo, reads incolæ munitionis, and for Solomo ædificavit Millo, he reads ædificabat munitionem, and so the Septuagint read it τὴν ἀκραν in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Jerusalem.

* Also the hill of Phineas, where Eleazar the high Priest the son of Aaron was buried, Jos. 24. 33. And the two tops of Hills, Gerizzim where the blessings, and Hebal, where the cursings were to be read to the people: of which Deut. 11. 27. & Jos. 8.

The other Cities of mark in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slain by Joshua; and Janoach, or Janoah, spoiled by Teglatphalassar: Pekah then governing Israel, with divers others, but of no great fame. The Mountains of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the sons of Joseph, on the West of Jordan: several parts whereof are the Hill of Samrom, or Samaria, 1 Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahas, Judg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon, or Salmon, Judg. 9. 48. The Hills of the Region of Tsuph, or Tsophim, Judg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tsophim stood, which was the City of Samuel.

a It seemeth that Jacob in this prophesie the rather useth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainly to signifie Colonies which in the Hebrew phrase are call'ed Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Josua, and elsewhere often.

The great plenty of fruitful Vines upon the sides of the Mountains, was the occasion that Jacob in the spirit of prophecy Gen. 49. 22. compared Joseph's two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her a Daughter branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezek. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prosecutes: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Jacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lyon. Upon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the Plains on both sides of Jordan, they find the Castle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Joseph. 1. bell. Jud. 2. in which Castle, as it is 1 Mac. 16. Ptolomy most traiterously at a banquet, slew Simon Macchabæus his father-in-law.

Among

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in 2 Sam. 23. 30. where though Junius reads, Hiddai ex una vallium Gahasi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus read Giddai, of the River of Gaas. Also in this Tribe they place the River of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was * fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travelled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poor widow of Zarepta, whose dead son he revived, and increased her pittance of Meal and Oil: whereby she sustained her life.

SECT. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the first Kings of Israel I omit in this place to speak, and reserve it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to speak. The first of these Kings Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephrathite, of Zereda, who being a man of strength and courage, was by Solomon made overseer of the buildings of the Munition in Jerusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time, as he went to Jerusalem, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God destined to be King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumæan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab; which Adad the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; using both him and Jeroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judæa, that himself might the easelier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Rehoboam, Shishak sack't the City of Jerusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Adadezor of Soba, with the presents of Toha, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

1 King. 14.

This Jeroboam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that State: yet preferring the policies of the World before the Service and Honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule should repair to Jerusalem to do their usual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith Saint Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calf in Horeb:) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Judæan Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored: but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened, upon occasion that the Prophet returning, was slain by a Lyon; Ahijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

Ambrose upon the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans.

He was afterward overthrown by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty years; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted out by Baasha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two years.

1 King. 11 12, &c.

Baasha the son of Abijah, the third King after the partition, made War with Asa King of Juda: he seated himself in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama: but being an Idolater, he was threatned by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befal his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to pass: He ruled four and twenty years, and died.

1 King. 15 & 16.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his son, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophesie of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seven days; but Ambris in revenge of the Kings murder, set upon Zambris, or Zimri, and incloséd him in Thersa, and inforc't him to burn himself.

1 King. 16

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regal seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater no less impious than the rest: and therefore subjected to Tabremmon King of Syria, the father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the son of Tabremmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assail Baasha King of Israel, the father of Ela, who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve years, six in Thersa, and six in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

SECT. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

ACHab, or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not only upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezabel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the sacrifice, and killed the false Prophets; and afterward flieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which, the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michæas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joyning with Josaphat in the War for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Michæas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochosias, Joram, and Joas: besides seventy other sons by sundry Wives and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall: and sent for counsel to Beelzebub the god of Acharon.

Beelzebub was the same with Belus and Pluto, saith Vigenere upon Levi.

Eliah the Prophet meeteth the Messenger on the way: and misliking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idol, asked the Messenger, if there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each 50 Souldiers, to bring Eliah unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captain besought mercy at Eliah's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to pass in the second year of his reign.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000 sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Desarts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrown: their King flieth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatning, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatning, had burnt the King of Edoms son upon the Rampire, that all the Assailants might discern it, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle inraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up. 2 King. 3.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth send to heal a man of his Leprosie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrel against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians, of Simon Magus 2 King. 1.5

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsel, sent a Troop of Horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha struck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extream famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and Armour to sound in the Air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the Kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramath-Gilead: in which War he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Army of Jordan in Gilead, was anointed King, by one of the children of the Prophets, sent by Elisha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab. 2 King. 7.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not only the race of his Fore-goers, but also their Religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous War, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which War he was slain, saith Cedrenus; whereof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28 years. Pag. 86.

Joachaz, or Jehoachaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him only 50 Horse, 20 Chariots, and 10000 Foot: and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17 years. 2 King. 13

After Joachaz, Joas his son governed Israel, who when he repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bow, and Elisha covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window Westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows: who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had so many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the Son of Azael, which his Father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the War, whereupon he entred Jerusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Joas reigned sixteen years and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better. 2 King. 14.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Joas his Father, an Idolater, as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath, which is near Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty years.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the House of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, governed six Moneths. Shallum held the Kingdom but one Moneth, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem, who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledg him: ripping the Bellies of those that were with Child. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of Silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every Man of wealth in Israel. Menahem governed twenty years. 2 Kings 16. 19.

Pekahiah, or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phacesia, succeeded, and after he had ruled two years, he was slain by Phaca, or Pekah the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekah's time, Phulasser, or Tiglat-Phylasser invaded the Kingdom of Israel, and won Jion, Abel-Bethmaacah, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captives into Assyria: he was drawn in by Achaz King of Judæa, against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith 1 Kings 15. 29.

with, ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inviting of the great Assyrian, was the utter ruine of both States, of Israel, and of Judæa. Pekah reigned twenty Years.

Then Hoshea, or Osea, who slew Pekah, became the vassal of Salmanasser; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoak, he sought aid from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt: which being known to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and master'd it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Nineve in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them: and re-planted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthæ, (inhabiting about Cutha, a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacharib vaunteth) also with those of Ava, which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Havæi, willing to return to their antient seats. To these he added those of Chamath, or Ituræa, the antient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian advise himself better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judæa and Jerusalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their own thin Garrisons, which soon decayed; and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the year of the World, 3292 the sixth year of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hosea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasse.

SECT. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOw following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700 fighting Men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their Sons 66400, bearing arms. The first famous City in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19 of Josua: one of the most antient of the World, Ver. 46. and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Jerusalem. From hence Jonas imbarked himself when he fled from the service of God towards Tharcis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabæus governed the Jews, the Syrians that Mat. 2.12. were garrison'd in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200 principal Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape, to the Sword.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Cestius the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ, 1250 Lodowick the French King gave it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster, by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the People of Rome. S. Jerom upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently. Lib. 3. 1. 15. de bel. Jud. Solin c. 47. Plin l. 5. cap. 9.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Macchabæus burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seen at Jerusalem, 240 furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seat, saith Will. of Tyre; but there is no sign of it at this time, that such a place there was. 2 Mac. 12. de bel. sacr.

After Jamnia is the City of Geth, or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volaterran. And so Montanus seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, F 245.

of all the Philiſtim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volateran gives neither reaſon nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomy ſets Anthedon far to the South of Joppe: and Geth was the firſt and not the laſt (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philiſtims: and about ſixteeen miles from Joppe: where St. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the ſame name. It was ſometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anakims, ſtrong and Giant-like Men, whom Joſua could not expel, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Iſraelites, till Davids time: who ſlew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferiour in ſtrength and ſtature unto Goliath.

Hierom. in Micheam.

Roboam the Son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the Son of Amazia deſtroyed it again. It was alſo laid waſte by Azael King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Jeruſalem, built a Caſtle in the ſame place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the ſame that Will. of Tyre in the Holy War calls Ibiilin, I much doubt; the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Lib. 21. c. 18.

Not far from Geth or Gath ſtandeth Bethſemes, or the Houſe of the Sun. In the Fields adjoyning to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoak of two Kine, turned looſe by the Philiſtims: and the Bethſemites preſuming to look therein, there were ſlain of the Elders 70, and of the people 50 thouſand, by the ordinance of God. After which ſlaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great [a] Abel, ſaith St. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name; one in * Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Iſſachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

1 Sam. 6. 18.

* Or rather not the City it ſelf, but the great ſtone in the feild, upon which ſtone the Philiſtims ſet the Ark, the change being eaſy from Eben, or Aben, which ſignifieth a ſtone, to Abel which ſignifieth mourning.

Keeping the Sea-coaſt, the ſtrong City of Accaron offereth it ſelf, ſometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philiſtims. St. Hierome makes it the ſame with Cæſaria Paleſtinæ. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of thoſe that defended it ſelf againſt the Danites and Idumæans. It worſhipped Beel-zebub, the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idol it was that Ahaziah King of Iſrael ſent to enquire of his health: whoſe meſſengers Eliah meeting by the way, cauſed them to return with a ſorrowful anſwer to their Maſter. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Aſdod, was alſo an habitation of the Anakims, whom Joſua † failed to deſtroy, though he once poſſeſt their City. Herein ſtood a ſumptuous Temple, dedicated to the ‖ Idol Dagon: the ſame Idol which fell twice to the ground of it ſelf, after the Ark of God was by the Philiſtims carried into their Temple: and in the ſecond fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Near it, was that famous * Judas Macchabæus ſlain by Bacchides and Alcimus the Leivetenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: and the reſt of the Citizens being put to the Sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idol therein conſumed with Fire: neer which alſo he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinius the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Biſhops Seat while Chriſtianity flouriſhed in thoſe parts. But in St. Hieroms time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the laſt of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eaſtward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apoſtle baptized the Eunuch, are Iſorath, or Sarxa, and Eſthaol, and between them Caſtra Danis near Hebron: though this place where Sampſon was born, may ſeem by the words, Judg. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judah, as the other alſo were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After theſe within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor, or as it is 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lievtenant of Antiochus fortified againſt the Jews, and neer which, himſelf was by the Macchabees overthrown. 1 Mac. 15. 16.

Alias Coriath-baal & Baal, or Baal-pharoſim.

There are beſides theſe the City of Cariathiarim, that is, the City of the woods: ſeated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained 20 years in the Houſe of Aminadab: till ſuch time as David carried it thence to Jeruſalem. Of this place (as they ſay) was Zacharias the Son of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was ſlain between the Temple and the Altar: alſo Urias, whom Joachim King of Jeruſalem ſlaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe rather, as I take it, upon preſumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caſpin taken with great ſlaughter by Judas Macchabæus: and Lechis, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſua, in which alſo Amaziah was ſlain: The ſame which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, ſee in Joſua c. 19. from the ver. 41. where alſo it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Leſhem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the Brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæſarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coaſts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this City ſee more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Norther-moſt riſeth out of the Mountains of Juda: and paſſing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the names of Sorek or Sored, whoſe banks are plentiful of Vines which have no Seeds or Stones: the Wine they yeild is Red, of excellent colour, taſte, and ſavour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, ſo called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Samſon loved.

SECT. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes up the reſt of the Sea-coaſt of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the ſecond Son of Jacob by Lea, there were increaſed of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300 able Men, all which ending their lives in the Deſarts, there entred the Land of Promiſe of the iſſues 22200 bearing arms, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part ſevered, inhabiting a ſmall Territory on the Sea-coaſt belonging to Edumæa, of which the firſt City adjoyning to Dan, was Aſcalon.

* And therefore no marvel that divers places named Joſ. 15. in the large portion of Juda, be reckoned in this Tribe: ſee Joſ. 19. v. 1. and 9. where thus much is expreſſly noted by Volat. Geog. l. 11. f. 244.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Aſcalonitæ: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Hiſtory of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Aſcalus were the Sons of Hymenæus: and that Aſcalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Countrey, built this City, and called it after his own name: The ſame hath Nicolaus in his Hiſtory, ſaith Volaterran.

Diodorus

Diodorus Siculus in his third Book remembreth a Lake near Ascaion, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddess of the Syrians; having the Face of a Woman, and the Body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæstino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palœstine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned Men (saith Volaterran, as Antiochus, Sosus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the story of Bythinia. Vol. ut supra.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-Children of two years old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made War in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus murus cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instauravit, saith Adrichomius. Adrich. in Trib. Simeon.

In Davids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it in the Streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza. 2 Sam. 1.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza, the Syrians, Azan, of Azonus (as they say) the Son of Hercules. Other profane Writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much as to say, as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims, and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more antient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long seige demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desart. Vol. l. 11. Steph. de Urb. Jud. 16. 16. 1 Kings 6. & alib. Jos. 13. ant. 19.

Alexander Janeus King of the Jews surprised it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the Foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea-side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was forc't by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself and in his absence left John his Son and Successour, to be Governour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly City, and known by the name of Gazara. Mac. 1. 15. Broch. Itin

At the very out-let of the River of Besor, standeth Majoma the Port of Gaza: to which the priviledg of a City was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance, after the name of the Emperours Son. But Julian the Apostata soon after favouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima, Hist. trip. l. 6. c. 4. Niceph. 10. hist. cap. 4.

On the other side of Besor standeth Anthedon, defac'd by Alexander Janneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favorite of Augustus. Jos 13. in 19. 21.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Thœocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it. Pliny calls it Rhinocolura: and Josephus Rhinocorura: † Epiphanius reports it as Tradition, that at this place the World was divided by lot between the three Sons of Noah. Jos. 13. ant. 19, 21. 14, &c. * Junius calls it Vallis Ægypti, the name of the stream seems to be Sichor. See in Ascer, c. 7. sect. 3. ‖ 8. in the margent. † Epiph. tom. 2 in resal Manich & in Ancorato Gen. 10. 19.

Within the Land, and upon the River of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh and Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was near to the Wilderness of Beersheba, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elsewhere Beersheba, so sometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdom from the Philistim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; St. Hierome saith afterwards it was called Regio salutaris, the healthly Countrey: so that it was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg, or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey. 1 Sam. 30.

Next Dabir, sometime Cariath-Sepher, a City of Letters, the University, as they say, or Academy of old Palæstine. In St. Hierom's time, it seems, it had the name of Daema: Jos. 15. 49. it is called Urbs Sannæ: from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbahi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Calebs promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Josua and the Host of Israel were at the surprise, it appears, Jos. 10. 39. This City Jos. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simeon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this Tribe. Josep. 10, 11, 12. Jos. 11. 11.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of less fame, as Hajin, of which Jos. 19. 7. which also Jos. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon, (for which Junius thinks Hasham is named 1 Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Josua, these two are distinguished) also Tholad, so named 1 Chro. 4. 29. for which Jos. 19. 4. we have Eltholad. Chatzar-Susa, so named. Jos. 19. 5. for which Jos. 15. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa, Equitatus. * And also 1 Chron. 4. 31.

In the same places of Josua and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the same with that of which Num. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountains of Edumæa. For Israel fled not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Desart. Deut. 1.

The same places also name Beersheba in this Tribe; so called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelec: neer unto which Hagar wandred with her Son Ismael. It was also called the City of Isaac, because he dwelt long there, While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this Gen. 21. 31.

this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian Deſart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Joſhua, and of the Chronicles above noted, becauſe they help us nothing in ſtory, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being ſtrengthened in his own Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4.39. (the ſame place which in Joſ. 15.36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iſſue of Cham: where they ſeated themſelves: as alſo five hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroyed the Reliques of Amalek in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

* As it ſeems in the Land of Juda. See in the firſt Paragraph of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan.

The Mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Samſon the chiefeſt: unto which he carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Rivers are, Beſor, and the Torrent of Egypt, called Shichar, as is noted in Aſſer.

Jud. 16.3.

SECT. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda, the fourth ſon of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which, (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the Deſarts. And of their ſons there entred the Land of Canaan 76500, bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatneſs of this number was the greateſt Territory given, called afterward Judæa: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included: And many Cities named in thoſe Tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kind of Soveraignty over them: as Succoth, Cartathiarim, Lachis, Bethſemes, Tſiglag, Beerſheba, and others. The multitude of people within this ſmall Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the witneſs of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbred the people, they were found five hundred thouſand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the cheifeſt of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Judæa from Idumæa: whoſe King firſt ſurprized the Iſraelites as they paſſed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them ſome ſpoils, and many priſoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Iſraelites, the ſons of Keni, the Kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a poſſeſſion in that Territory: who before the coming of the Iſraelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Num. 21.3 Joſ. 12.14. Jud. 1.16.

Num. 34.4 Deut. 8 15

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed the next to Arad: ſo called becauſe of Scorpions, which are ſaid to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierom thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Acrabathena, was denominated: of which we have ſpoken in Manaſſes. On the South ſide alſo of Judæa they place the Cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſhna, Jethnam, and Aſſor, or Chatſor, moſt of them Frontier Towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Juda, of which the Deſart and Forreſt adjoyning took name: where David hid himſelf from Saul. After theſe are the Cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkah, and Aſcemona, or Hatſmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, we find the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Aſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which ſee Joſ. 15. alſo Carioth, by Joſ. 15. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called Iſ-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham, the abode of Sampſon, which Rehoboam re-edified. Beyond theſe, towards the North border, and towards Elutheropolis, is the City of Jethar, or Jathir, belonging to the Levites. In St. Heirom's time it was called Jethira: and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: neer unto this City was that remarkable battel fought between Aſa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithſtanding beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recovered.

Fud. 15 8. 1 Chr. 11.6 Jun. out of the 1 Chr. 4.31. notes that this Hetham, though it were within the bounds of Juda, belonged to Simeon. Joſ. 15.48. Hieron. in loc. Hebr.

Not far from Jether ſtandeth Jarmuth, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſhua, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Mereſa the Native City of the Prophet Michæa: between it and Odolla, Judas Machabæus overthrew Gorgias, and ſent thence ten thouſand Drachmas of ſilver to be offered for ſacrifice.

2 Mac. 12. 35.

Odolla, or Hadullam it ſelf, was an antient and magnificent City, taken by Joſhua, and the King thereof ſlain, Jonathan Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila, or Keila, afterward Echela, where David ſometime hid himſelf: and which afterward he delivered from the aſſaults of the Philiſtims: neer which the Prophet Habakkuk was buried: whoſe monument remained, and was ſeen by S. Hierom.

Gen. 38.1. Joſ. 12.15 1 Sam. 23.1

Neer it is Hebron, ſometime called the City of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reaſon of this name they give, as if it ſignified the City of four: becauſe the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but ſuppoſed: and it is plain by the places, Joſh. 14. 14. and 15.13. and 20.11. that Arbah here doth not ſignifie four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whoſe ſon as it ſeems Anak was: and Achiman, Sheſhai, and Talmai, (whom Caleb expelled, Joſh. 15.) were the ſons of Anak. Num. 13. 23. The name of Anak ſignifieth Torquem, a chain worn for ornament; and it ſeems that this Anak, inriched by the ſpoils which himſelf and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and ſo got this name: and leaving the cuſtom to his poſterity, left alſo the name: ſo that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiſs be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the antienteſt Cities of Canaan, built ſeven years before Tſoan, or Tanis, in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given, to wit, the Villages adjoyning, and the reſt to the Levites, It had a Biſhop in the Chriſtian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the mother of Conſtantine.

Not far hence they find Eleutheropolis, or the free City, remembred often by St. Jerom. Then Eglon, whoſe King Dabir aſſociated with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Jeruſalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, beſieging the Gibeonites, were by Joſhua utterly overthrown. From hence the next City of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Præſidencies of Judæa. In ſight of this City, Judas Macchabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias, Lieutenant to Antiochus.

Joſ. 10.11 Macc. 1. 3 Euſeb. in Chron. Broch. Iſm. 6.

In the year 1301. it was overturned by an earthquake, ſaith Euſebius. In the Chriſtian times, it had a Biſhops ſeat of the Dioceſs of Cæſarea of Paleſtine.

* Alſo 1 Chro 4.39. as is abo e remembred in the Tribe of Simeon.

From Emaus toward the Weſt Sea, there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which, and of Gederoth, * Joſh. 15.36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Joſhua followed lowed the slaughter of these five Kings before named, a City of great strength in the Valley of [a] Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seems) they seat it neer unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the subjection of the Jews while Joram the son of Josophat ruled in Jerusalem: And next unto this standeth Maceda, which Joshua utterly dis-peopled.

[a] Junius, for in Valle Terebinthi, hath in Valle quercetti. Vatablus keeps the Hebrew, reading in Valle Elah.

On the other side of Emaus towards the East, standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethsor: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Juda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rock, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Judas Macchabæus. Lysias forced it: and Antiochus Eutapor by famine, Jonathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Gen. 53. 48

Bethleem is next unto it within six miles of Jerusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is so called by Moses, before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this City was Abessan, or Ibsan Judge of Israel after Jephtah, famous for the thirty sons and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelek was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom David. It had also the honour to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and therefore shall the memory thereof never end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same name: and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethleem Juda.

From Bethleem some four or five mile standeth Thecua, the City of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adjoyning is the City of Bithzacaria, in the way between Bethsura and Jerusalem: on whose Hills adjoyning, the glorious guilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The City of * Bezek was also neer unto Bethleem, which Adonibezek commanded; who had during his reign torture'd 70 Kings, by cutting off the joynts of their Fingers and Toes; and made them gather bread under his Table: but at length the same end befell himself by the sons of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner.

* See in Manasse. c. 7. §. 7. ‖ 1

Jud. 1. 6, 7

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may pass by, until we come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200 Marble steps, exceeding beautiful and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoyning to the Desart of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Clivus floridus, where, in the time of Jehosaphat, the Jews stood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to joyn against Juda: neer which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange a deliverance.

Jos. 14. ant. 22.

2 Chro. 20. 16. and 26 2 Chro. 11 * Some call it Balsalisa and Vitula consternans. See in Gad. c. 10 sect. 5. post principium in Haroher.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tsohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called, because Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tsohar, which signifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans time it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Jerom's time, Balexona. Then Engaddi, or Hen-gaddi, first Asasonthamar: neer unto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the best that the world had, called Opo-Balsamum: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queen of Egypt sent for out of Judæa, and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her Husband, caused them to be rooted up, and presented unto her: which she re-planted neer Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judæa; and one of the Presidencies thereof.

Gen. 19. 20 Gen. 14. 7.

Hieron. in Ose. Hebr. Chatsatson-thamar. 2 Chro. 20. 2.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Jesrael: not that which was the City of Naboth, of which already, but another of the same name, the City of Achinoan, the wife of David, the mother of that Ammon whom Absalom slew: also, as some think, the City of Amasa, Absaloms Lieutenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this seemeth to be an errour grounded upon the neerness of the words Israel and Jesrael: and because the 2 Sam. 17. 25. Amasa's father is called an Israelite, who in the first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Ishmaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth that Amasa's father is not said to be of the City Jesrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Ishmaelite.

1 Reg. 21. 2 Sam. 17. 25.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountains: as those of Engaddi upon the Dead Sea: and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neer Taphna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oak of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which S. Jerom calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, That it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Collis Achillæ, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Jonathan Macchabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with twenty seven high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and Furniture for an hundred thousand men; being, as it seemeth a place unaccessable, and of incomparable strength.

Hieron. in loc. Heb. & quæst. Hebr. Jos. 14. Ant. c. 20.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrha, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnatural sins.

‖ I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites won from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's sons inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possess the Land promised 43700 bearing arms. But before we speak of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan; something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our Writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Esau, or Edom, the Idumæans: by Ishmael, Iſhmael, the eldeſt Son of Abraham, the Iſhmaelites: and by Ketura, his laſt wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brothers ſon, thoſe two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but ſtrangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly poſſeſt by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them deſcended) theſe iſſues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whoſe children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoyning.

Eſau and his ſons held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Iſhmael took from the South-eaſt part of the Dead Sea; ſtretching his poſſeſſion over all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Deſart, as far as the River of Tygris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the reſt of the coaſt of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and paſſing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Eſſebon, or Cheſbon.

Ammon ſate down on the North-eaſt ſide of Arnon, and poſſeſt the Tract from Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moſes's time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thruſt him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As theſe Nations compaſſed ſundry parts of Canaan, ſo the border between the River of Jaboc and Damaſcus, was held by the Amorites themſelves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the Eaſt ſide of Jordan, and on the Eaſt ſide of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moſes, to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manaſſe; whereof that part which Moab had, was firſt poſſeſt by the Emims, a Nation of Giants, weakned and broken by Chedorlaomer, after repulſed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory and antient poſſeſſion of the Zamzummims, or Zutæi, who were alſo beaten at the ſame time by Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the reſt: and by them an eaſie way of conqueſt was prepared for the Ammonites.

Joſ. 13. Num. 21. 24. Gen. 14.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the ſame is to be underſtood according to the time when Moſes wrote. For then had Sehon or his Anceſtor, beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon over Arnon; and this hapned not long before Moſes's arrival upon that border, when Vaheb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moſes paſt Arnon, was not the ſon of Vaheb, but his name was Balak, the ſon of Zippor. And it may be that thoſe Kings were elective, as the Edumæans antiently were.

Now, allthat part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Eſſebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Iſrael arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Jephtah the Judge of Iſrael juſtly defend the regaining of thoſe Countries againſt the claim of the Ammonites: becauſe (as he alledged) Moſes found them in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon: who (ſaith Jephtah) had 300 years time to recover them, and did not: whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

Judg. 11.

And leſt any ſhould marvel why the Ammonites in Jephtahs time ſhould make claim to theſe Countries: whereas Moſes in the place Num. 21.26. rather accounts them to have been the antient poſſeſſion of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11. when it is ſaid that the Iron bed of Og was to be ſeen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites, it is alſo ſignified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Iſraelites poſſeſſed, was by him or his Anceſtors got from the Ammonites: as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were ſeated ſo confuſedly together, that it was hard to diſtinguiſh them, ſo alſo were the ſons of Moab and Ammon, Madian, Amalek, and Iſhmael. Yet the reaſon ſeemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief, in Jephtah's time; for ſometime the one Nation, and ſometime the other of all thoſe borderers acquired the Soveraignty: and again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the Mountains of Galaad, or Gilead, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then ſought how to recover it again. Yet at ſuch time as Moſes overthrew Sehon at Jahaz, the Ammonites had loſt to the Amorites all that part of their poſſeſſion which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having diſplanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in Numb. 21. 24. that Iſrael conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: ſo as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon within the Mountains, when as antiently they had alſo poſſeſſions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites poſſeſt, as in the thirteenth Chapter of Joſhua, verſe twenty fifth, it appears.

Joſ. 13. 25. Junius notes that the one half of the land of Hammon, which in this place of Joſhua is ſaid to have been given to the Gadites, was taken firſt from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place Deut. 2. 11 proves that as well Og, as Sehon had gotten lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

‖. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THe chief Cities belonging to Reuben were theſe, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any ſhew of warrant, readeth Jethſon. The Vulgar or Jerom followed the Septuagint, thoſe two Verſes, 36. and 37. in Joſ. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedſon for Kedmoth, which Kedſon by writing ſlipt into Jethſon.

Joſ. 21. 37.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Deſart adjoyning: from whence Moſes ſent his Embaſſage to Sehon. In the ſame place of Joſhua, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betſar & villa ejus, reads Boſor in ſolitudine Miſor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Miſor, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead Sea (for the Country between, being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of note, Laſa or Leſhaſh, of which Gen. 10.19. The Greeks call it Calirhoe: near which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and ſweet water; all which ſoon after their riſing, being joyned in one ſtream, do make a very wholeſome Bath, eſpecially for all contraction of ſinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was deſparate of all other help, repaired, but in vain. Others ſay, that theſe Springs ariſe out of the Hills of Machærus, in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenyes, and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's, or Kings. The other Town is Machærus, the next between Laſa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the ſtrongeſt In-land City and Caſtle, ſtanding upon a Mountain every way unacceſſible. It was firſt fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a frontier againſt the Arabians: but it was demoliſhed by Gabinius in the war with Ariſtobulus, ſaith Joſephus. It was thither (ſaith Joſephus) that Herod ſent John Baptiſt, and wherein he was ſlain: his Army ſoon after being utterly overthrown by Aretas King of Arabia, and himſelf after this

Deu. 2.26. It was a marginal note out Deut. 3. where the Septs. kept the word Miſor, ſignifying a plain, which after crept into the Text. Joſ. 17. ant. c. 9. & Hieron. in quæſt. Heb. in Gen. Acoſta l. 3. Joſ. ant. 13 cap. 24. & 14. ant. c. 10. & Abbi. Joſeph. bel. Jud. l. 7. c. 25.

this murther never prospering. Not far from Machærus was Bosor, or Bozra, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

*Num.*25.1 To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel imbraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their sin; and from hence Joshua sent the discoverers Jos. 13. 1. to view Jericho, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Junius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses called, *Deut.*34.1 The plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desart of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chatseroth, and Dizahab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in Palæstina: the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medava, and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Junius's edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deut. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

* The same as it seems which Nu. 21. 30. is called Medeba, whence we read of the plains of Medeba, Jos. 13. 9. 16. of which also we read in the wars of David against Hanun the Ammonite, 1 Chr. 19. 7. Also 1 Mac. 9. 36 Isa. 16. 2. See before c. 2. §. 7.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cœlosyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cœlosyria stood: which was in the Region of Decapolis; and, as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be over against or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suphah: which doubtless was about these plains of Moab towards the Dead Sea: where the Country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as also the Red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

John 1. 28 Jud. 7. 24. Josep. ant. 4. 7. The place in these large plains of Moab where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say was Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the story of Gideon is called Beth-bara. Josephus says it was where after the City Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place set with Palm-trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the plains of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim, and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42 and last place of the Israelites incamping in the Num. 15. 1 Exo. 25. 10 time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma, and Hes- Nu. 31. 37. Gen. 14. 5. Num. 32. bon the chief City of Sehon, and Elhalel, and Kiriathaima the seat of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which, Junius, Isa. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idol-Oracle, and Baal-meon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idol was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, Moses before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius doth not take Phasgah, or Pisgah for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgah that top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, mentioned Jos. 13. 20. called Ashdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisgæ: to wit, where the waters did run down from Pisga. In the same place of Josua there is also named Beth-Peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idol was called Baal-Peor; which, they say, was the same as Priapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-Baal, of which also Jos. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which, Num. 22. 41. they read, the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

* Exod. 23 13. Nomen deorum alienorum ne recordamini, ne audiatur in ore tuo. Psal. 26. 4. Non assumpturus sum nomina eorum in labiis meis: Hos. 2. 17. Amovebo nomina Bahalimorum ab ore ejus: what name they used for Nebo it doth not appear: but Baal-meon it seems they named sometime Bajith as Esa 15. 2. and sometime Beth-meon, Esay 48. 23.

§. III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THere were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the City of Phalti: to whom Saul gave his daughter Michol from David: but Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. 19. we may say, that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well, called Beer: Then Deblathaim, Jerem. 48. which the Prophet Jeremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

1 Sam. 25. ult.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chief City of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations; of which, these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slain, and their Regal City with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince or Priest, forgat not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful travels through the Desarts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, and some- Esay 16. 1 time reckoned as the chief City of Edom, there is that 1 Kings 14 Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which 7. is as much as rupes, or petra. It was also called Joctheel, as appears by the place, 2 Kings 14. It was built Lib. 4. ant. 7. (saith Josephus) by Recem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites: slain as before is said: after whom it was called Recem. Now, they say, it is called Crac, and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City: the same perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Province adjoyning took name: which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabajoth, the Son of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petræa (at least where it is not misunderstood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, instead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petræa: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles, the fifth, calls Hagarens of Hagar.

1 Chron. 5 19. & 20.

This City Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Army, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of money, and to quit it. Yet Amasias King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the Valley called Sallinarum) wan also this City. St. Hierime finds Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this City. In the mean time, when the Christians held the Kingdom of Jerusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before, been under the Greek Church. It is seated nor far from Hor, where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the River Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38 station. Adrichomius describeth the Waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Save: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Saveh, which is the Kings Dale, where Absalom set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Jerusalem. And at the same time Melchisedek King of Salem also encountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedek inhabiting, either neer Bethsan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Jerusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

Haraboth* every where; and so also the edition of Varablus, Deut. 3. 17. though Deut. 4. 44. it hath mare solstitiale, as also 2 Reg. 14. 25. the reason of this name seems to be because it joyns to the plains of Moab, which are called Harboth Moab, Deut. 34. 1. as also we have Cesulothin Harbath, that is, in the plains, to wit, of Zabulon, 1 Mac. 9. 2. whence Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon, called Araba.

¶. IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOw because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake Asphaltitis, and the Salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh Water) also the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea * of the Plains, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes a hundred eighty furlongs (which makes 22 miles and a half of ours) and about 150 in breadth, which make 18 of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal less: but those that have of late years seen this Sea, did account it (saith * Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut suitus aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superjecta ut solido feruntur, periti, imperitique nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers: it is neither moved nor raised by the Wind, nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskilfull of swiming, as well as the skilfull, are born up by the Water. At one time of the year casteth it up Bitumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like businesses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: The fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning; of which the ruines remain, the ground looking with a sad face, as having lost her fruitfulness; for whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeness, having nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples or Oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltitis. Vespasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports went on purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskilful in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

¶. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Countrey within Arnon, Reuben possest.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countrey (within Arnon) Reuben possest (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21. of Num. v. 14. nameth Vaheb: which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the Son of Zippor: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon, and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaams cursings or inchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God blest Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to send Madianitish women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen, but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsel, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

Num. 21, 22, 23, 24. Jos. 24.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saving that we find in the first of Chronicles, the fourth, that Jokim and the Men of Chozeba, and Joash, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are antient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these Mens governments are no where extant or remaining, or as others, hæc prius fuere, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their their posterity choose rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Judges 3. Then we find Eglon King of Moab, who with the help of Ammon and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eighteen years: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own house, and afterward a 1000 of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had, unto whom David fled, fearing Saul, it doth not appear:

1 Sam. 22. or whether it were the same against whom Saul made War, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul he

After this, David himself entred the Region of Mo-

1 Chro. 18. Ps. 60. 10. Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shooe: meaning, that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Idumæans.

The next King after Davids time of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mesha, who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of 2 Kings 3. David) fastned himself to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab, 100000 Lambs, and 200000 Rams with the Wooll: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda and Idumæa: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Jehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another,

2 Chro. 20. so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab

Hiirem 7. which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many descents: for Mesha lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekia's time, 14 Kings of Juda coming between, who wasted three hundred and odd years.

SECT. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THe Territory adjoyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of

Gen. 30. the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the Num. 32. Children of Gad, the seventh Son of Jacob by Zelpha,

Jos. 13. the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desarts, 45550 and of their Sons there entred the Land promised, 45000 bearing Arms: for the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Hesbon, Elbele, and Aphec.

Esay 15. The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make Deut. 2. to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Harobero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine: Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the bank of the River, as also in like manner, (Jos. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Harober, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neer Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possest by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith, he hath given Har for an inheritance to the Sons of Lot. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harober, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numbers, chap. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. ver. 25. where Haroher is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seat not Haroher neer it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbath here, we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Haroher. And as for * Har, (which also gave the name to the coast adjoyning) it seems, it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakned by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Haroher by the enterchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jephta by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites under the conduct of Jephta.

In St. Hieroms time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say was therefore called Vitula consternans, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was thrice overthrown with earth quakes: for which cause also Hierom seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-Salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14. 2.) and Salisha, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three Earth-quakes.

Brochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-East border. Between Haroher and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Num. 32. 34. though Jos. 13. v. 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City, among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Jeremy propheſied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neer Arnon in St. Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay propheſied, That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrah in this Tribe, Adrichomius placeth Jogbeha and Nobach, or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears Numbers 32. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith he) went and took Kenath with her Towns, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Verses precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this seat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 34. 35, 36. therefore it may seem that this

* Deut. 2. 9. Out of which place the words Num. 21. 28. are to be expounded not that the City of Hor, but coast adjoyning was wasted by Sehon. Gen. 14. 5. Judg 11. 15. Hier: in epitap. Paul. & in quæst. & loc. Hebr. see Junius his annotations upon 1 Sam. 9. 2. where he makes Shalisha a plain country in Benjamin, and the same with Baalshalisha, 2 Reg. 4. 42. where he expounds Bal, or Baal to be as much as Planities.

this * Nobach was in that part of Manasse which was in the East of Jordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak † in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebah and Zalmunnah rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2 Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain, that it was still a principal City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Coronæ.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Bethnimra of which we have spoken, Jos. 13. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Beth-nimra, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Josua it is called Beth-haram) some take to be Betaramptha, of which ‖ Josephus, after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in * Josephus) or from Beth-remphan (of which Remphan, an Idol of those Countries, we read, Acts 7. 43. and to which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1 Mac. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Josephus, sometime Bataramptha) the same Josephus placeth in the Region of Perœa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Perœa, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the Countrey beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set down the bounds of this Perœa, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia, Augustus his Wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julias, he saith was built by Philip the Brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Perœa, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Vetezobra, as it is called in Josephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hissopi. Of a noble Woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Jerusalem, and was there besieged. Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History, how for hunger she eat her own Child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Jos. 13 is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, weary in the pursuit of Zebah, and Zalmunnah, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-Car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to tear their flesh as they were prest and trod under the Tribulum, and after which sort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron Teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in hast, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth, that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the Children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty years in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted.

Other four Cities of Gad are named, Josua 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaiim, Chesbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jahzer, as Chezbon, or Hesbon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Countrey is called the Land of Jahzer. It was taken by Moses having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Esay touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay, also Hieremy in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabæus: as it is 1 Mac. 5. 8. where Junius out of Josephus, reads Jahzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Jos. 16. 3. and 8. and Jud. 1. 29.) was far from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a Dowry with his Daughter.

Of Chesbon it may be marvelled that in the place of Josua, and 1 Chron. 6, 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, seeing Jos. 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principal City of the Reubenites: Adricomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Mac. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Macchabæus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seems that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaiim, which word signifieth a double Army, we read Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoast or company, to joyn with his, for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we read of a multitude of the Hoast of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so unto the godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soon after to joyn battel with the Pagan Penda of middle England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the Field where the Battel was fought, in the North parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Machanaiim, David abode during the rebellion of Absalom: and the same for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Ishbosheth, during the War between David and the House of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which, King Achab lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mizpa, of which Jos. 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the

* Num. 21. 30. It is called Nophach, and placed in the border of the Kingdom of Sehon towards Basan, and therefore it is not altogether improbable that it was in Gad.

the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-see, and be witness to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31.49. That in these parts there was not only a Town, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appears Jos. 11.3. where we read of the Chivites under Hermon, in the Country of Mitspa, * the Town of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth verse following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephta the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mitspa, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mitspa rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Macchabæus this Town of Mitspa (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and the Males of it slain: for it was then possest of the Ammonites.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc, was that Peniel, or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the City of that great and faithful subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Nahanaima, where he sustained King David, during Absaloms rebellion. To these they add the Town of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alimis, Adrichomius frames of ἐν Αλέμοις, 1 Mac. 5. 26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Junius out of Josephus reads Mallæ, for this in Alimis: and understanding Mallæ to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) he takes this Mallæ to be Mitspa Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. 22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be * Rithma, of which Num. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vinearum, though by some they be attributted to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephta's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was neare, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that † Philadelphia which Ptolomy finds in Cœlosyria. Jerom and Calistus, in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but, as it seems, never possest by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regal seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness, infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their antient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan, the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450 years since that these Zamzummims, or Raphaims, were expelled, yet they did not forget their antient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captains of Persia and Assyria (remembred in the 14th of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became loathful and licentious; they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and vertue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth. Deut. 3. The City was taken in Davids time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias, was shot to death, having been, by direction from David, appointed to be imployed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill success afterward, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon wore: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idol, weighing a talent, 2 Sam. 12. which is 60 pound weight, after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and under him twelve others. Will. Tyr. Bel. sacr. 13 c. 22. Pto.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomy calleth the Hills of Hippus, a City of Cœlosyria: and Strabo, * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus, unto the Desarts of Moab: and receive divers names, as commonly Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: for from the South part, as far Northwards as Astaroth, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence Northward they are known by the name of Hermon, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Deut. 3.9.

Strab. l. 6. * τραχὼν is locus asper & salebrosus: whence it appears, that Trachonitis regio, in these parts was properly the hill country.

* The letters D and R in the Hebrew are very like, so that one is oft mistaken for another, and sometime without mistaking, one is put for another, as for Rodanim. 1 Chron. 7. we have Dodanim. Gen. 10.4.

† Other names of this City, according to Stephanus, were Ammana and Astarte: but in this latter perhaps he mistook, which might seem to be the same Astaroth, one of the chief Cities of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoken of, Manasse Adrichomius says, it was also called Urbs aquarum, because of the river Jaboc's winding about it; but in the place 2 Sam. 27. whence he gathers this opinion, Junius reads intercepi ab urbe aquam, if we must read with others, cepi ut urbem aquarum, yet it cannot be taken of Rabba it self, but of some other Fort adjoyning, Gen. 14.

the Amorites, Shenir, others, Seir: of which name all those hills also were called, which part Judæa and Idumæa: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so Jer. 2. 2. the Prophet Jeremy makes them all one, calling the high Mountains of Gilead, the head of Libanus.

These Mountains are very fruitful, and full of Jer. 8, & 9 good pastures, and have many Trees which yield Balsamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jaboc: others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

SECT. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wan from Og, the King of Basan.

THis Tribe of Gad possest half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the Mountains Trachones, or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephta Judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they Jud. 10. were at peace with them again.

Afterward we find that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nahas, who besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their
1 Sam. 11. right eyes. The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Joseph. l. 6. Ant. c. 5. &c. Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seem, became 2 Sam. 10. 4. 18. the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Josephus thinks that this Nahas was slain in the battel, when Saul raised the siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanun succeeded Nahas: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadours garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterward, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites, subject to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from * Istob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were overturned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crown which weighed a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kills. Josaphat governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Ozias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham inforc't to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

* Istob, that is, the men of Thob: Thob is a small Territory under Arnon hills. Rehob is another between Hazor and Sidon, in the North bound of Canaan, Nu. 13. 22. of which see in the Tribe of Asser. Jer. 40. and 41. 2 Chr. 20. 2 Chr. 36. 2 Chr. 26.

The fifth King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalis the confederate of Zedekia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ishmael, of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

SECT. VII.

Of the other half of Manasse.

THe rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basan, with the land of Hus and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Batania, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan; of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against them for many ages. But Batania, Ptolomy setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desart: and all those other Provinces before named with Petræa, and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cœlosyria; as far South as Rabba, or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, saving the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petræa: for many of these small Kingdoms take not much more ground than the country of Kent.

* Another territory adjoyning to Manasse, whose limits were confounded with some of these, was that Thisbitis the country of Elias, as it is 1 Kings 16. 1. and of Tobias, Tob. 1. 2. It lay on the East to the Tribe of Nephtalim on the right hand of it, as in Tob. 1. 2. and was possest by Colonies of the Israelites in the time of Saul, after his victory over the Amalekites and Ishmaelites in those parts, as it is gathered out of 1 Chron. 5. 10. whence it appears, that it was part of Ituræa, of which chap. 7. §. 4. ‖. 5, and 6.

Basan, or, after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it self from the River of Jaboc to the * Machati and Gessuri: and from the Mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattel. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of oaks, which bare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias; Howl, O ye oaks of Bashan) and by reason hereof they bred so many swine, as † 2000 in one herd were carried headlong into the Sea, by the unclean spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it 60 Cities walled and defenced: all which, after Og and his sons were slain, Jair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own name, Avoth Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

* So they call them of Mahacath, of which somewhat hath been spoken toward the end of the fifth Paragrah of this Chapter, see 1 Mac. 5. 36 and Deut. 3. 14. and Jos. 12. 5. † Mar. 5. 13.

The principal Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes * Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Son, Alexander the great, were born. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Jannæus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim, by the River of Jaboc, taken by † Judas Macchabæus: where he set on fire the † Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thereunto for Sanctuary; and neer it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong City of † Ephron neer Jordan: which refusing to yeild passage to † Judas Macchabæus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

* Antiently, as it seems, it was called Tephel. See above in the bounds of Meah, in this Chapter, §. 4. ‖. 2.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabesus, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being besieged by Nahas † King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is † elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens † recovered, embalmed and buried the bodies

At the foot of the Hill there ſpring forth alſo hot baths, as at Machærus. Alexander Jannæus after ten months ſiege, wan it, and ſubverted it. Pompey reſtored it: and Gabinius

To the Eaſt of Gadara they place Sebei * in which, Joſ. ant. 5. 13. ſaith, Jephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 12.7. Sepultus eſt in Civitate ſua Gilehad, (for in una Civitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a City, and to be the ſame with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Mac. 5. 26. where it readeth Caſphor for Chesbon; the ſame Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Civitas: ſo of one City Hesbon, or Chesbon, which they call Eſſebon, the chief City of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: This Caſphor in Manaſſes, and a City in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admoniſhed the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (ſo called, becauſe the Hill on which it ſtood, was in faſhion like the back of a Camel) which Joſephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis over againſt Tarichea, which is on the Weſt ſide of the Sea

In vita ſua. About four miles Weſt from Gadara, and as much Eaſt from Tiberias (which is on the other ſide of the Lake) Joſephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomy gives the names to the Hills that compaſs the Plains in which it ſtandeth: ſo that it may ſeem to have been of no ſmall note. It is ſeated far from the hill Country: on the Eaſt of the Lake, as alſo Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. It was reſtored by Pompey: after by Auguſtus added to Herod's Tetrarchy: it was
